#51(L)

Memorandum 65-81

Subject: Study No. 51(L) - Right to Support After Ex Parte Divorce

Accompanying this memorandum is the tentative recommendation (on pink paper) that was prepared to carry out the Commission's decisions at the July meeting.

Also accompanying this memorandum, as Exhibit II (yellow paper), is the staff's suggested revision of Section 272 to provide for a different choice of law rule than is now provided in Section 272.

We also include as Exhibit I a revised tentative recommendation that we believe would effectuate the substance of Commissioner McDonough's proposal on this subject. The blue pages of Exhibit I are the same as the corresponding pages of the current tentative recommendation. The pages that were revised are on gold paper. Differences between the statute contained in Exhibit I and that now appear in the tentative recommendation are indicated by strikeout and underscore.

The draft contained in Exhibit I is based on the following propositions:

The statute dealing with support after ex parte divorce should concern itself only with what the substantive law of California is. The applicability of the California law to a particular case should be left to the courts. The statute should not attempt to deal with choice of law problems.

Hence, we omitted the suggested provision:

The provisions of this title are to be applied only when the law of this state is applicable to the case. Whether the law of this state is applicable is a question of law to be decided by the court.

It seems to us that if the court is left free to determine when the law of California is applicable, it may decide in a particular case that some of the law provided in the title can be applied while some of the California law cannot be applied. The availability of the Uniform Support acts for enforcement purposes, the availability of an action to terminate further post-divorce support liability, etc., might be determined by the court under California law despite a decision to apply the substantive law of another state insofar as defenses are concerned.

Because most of the recommendation and statute deal with substantive questions (as distinguished from choice of law questions), you will note that the revisions that we believe are necessary to remove choice of law questions from the statute are quite modest.

The remainder of this memorandum will discuss the alternatives before the Commission and will attempt to indicate whether the drafting of fixed choice of law rules is feasible or desirable. We will do this by discussing the various factors mentioned in the letter Commissioner McDonough distributed at the last meeting.

Alternatives

The Commission must decide whether fixed choice of law rules should be recommended or not. If the Commission decides that fixed rules should not be recommended, it should address itself to the draft designated as Exhibit I.

If fixed choice of law rules are decided upon, the possible alternatives are as follows:

1. Apply California law willy-nilly to determine both the substance of the right to support and whether it survives ex parte divorce. This was approved in principle at the July meeting. The justification for the view appears on page 6 of the tentative recommendation (pink).

- 2. Apply the law of the obligee's domicile at the time of the divorce to determine both the substance of the right to support and whether it survives divorce. This view has been advanced at our own discussions of the subject.
- 3. Apply the law of the obligor's domicile at the time of the divorce to determine the substance of the support right, but the law of the obligee's domicile to determine whether the right to support survives divorce. This view is expressed in Exhibit II (yellow).
- 4. Apply the law of the obligee's domicile at the time of the divorce to determine whether the right to support survives, but apply the law of the matrimonial domicile to determine the substance of the right. This view has not been advanced expressly, but it has seemed implicit in some of the illustrative situations that have been mentioned in our discussions.

Factors to consider

Commissioner McDonough's letter that was distributed for the November meeting mentions several variable factors that might have a bearing on the choice of law in a particular case. We will consider those for the purpose of determining what policy problem is presented by each variable and whether that policy problem can be met adequately by a fixed choice of law rule.

1. Is the husband or wife suing for support? This question seems important because of the fact that all states require husbands to support wives, but only 27 states require wives to support husbands. Thus, this question seems to be raising the question of what law is to be used to determine whether a former husband may recover support from his former wife. The next four questions also seem to be raising the same policy questions:

- 2. Where is the support action plaintiff domiciled when the action is filed?
- 3. Where is the support action defendant domiciled when the action is filed?
- 4. What is the law or policy of the support action plaintiff's domicile and what consideration should it be given?
- 5. What is the law or policy of the support action defendant's domicile and what consideration should it be given?

The present version of the recommendation gives no consideration to any of the above factors. California law is applied in all cases. Thus, if H and W reside in Arizona (which does not require wives to support husbands), H may obtain a support order against W from a California court if he is fortunate enough to be able to get personal jurisdiction over her in California. That he had no right of support during the marriage or at the time of the divorce is of no consequence under the current version.

Alternatives of #2, #3, and #4 all disregard factors 2-5. The law of the support action forum or of the domicile of one of the parties will, however, be applied in many instances because the fixed choice of law rule will result in application of that law--but such application is coincidental, not deliberate. The policy underlying all of the fixed rule alternatives suggested is: The parties are no longer married. They should not be regarded as married. Their mutual rights and obligations of support were not determined at the time of the divorce, and it is necessary, therefore, to determine them now. But because they are no longer married, it is important that these rights and obligations be determined with reference to a specific point in time--the time when the marriage was legally dissolved (or, under #4, when it ended in substance). Fixing their rights in such a manner enables them to know precisely what their rights and duties are so that they may incur new marital and family obligations without fear of possible claims arising out of the previous relationship. To apply the law of the forum or of either party's domicile as of the present time is, in effect, to treat the parties as still married for support purposes; for just as married persons' mutual rights and obligations change as they migrate from state to state, so the ex-spouses' rights and obligations change until the action is brought if present substantive law is applied.

As a policy matter, we think the certainty provided by a rule fixed at the time of the marriage dissolution (either as a legal or as a factual matter) far outweighs in value any possible good that might arise out of permitting a needy former husband to obtain support from a former wife when he had no right to do so during their marriage—even though his hardship in the particular situation may be extreme.

- 6. Should California refuse to entertain a support action or an action to terminate the right to support following an ex parte divorce unless
 - (a) Plaintiff is domiciled here; or
 - (b) Defendant is domiciled here; or
 - (c) Both are domiciled here.

All of the fixed rule alternatives say "No." We entertain support actions on behalf of nonresident wives now. Hiner v. Hiner, 153 Cal. 254 (1908). We can see no reason to refuse jurisdiction merely because one party obtained an exparte divorce. In dictum, the California courts have indicated that they will entertain support actions against nonresident husbands, and it seems likely that such actions can be maintained under the Reciprocal Support Act. So we see no reason to suggest a different rule to be applied after dissolution of the marriage.

Moreover, we think it is desirable for the statute to make it clear that we will entertain such an action. When parties know (or can find out by asking) what their rights are, they can more readily plan their lives and settle their disputes without having to rely on the courts to determine what their rights are.

7. Was the divorce action brought in

- (a) California?
- (b) A sister state?
- (c) A foreign country?

We do not quite understand what the policy question posed here is. All of the fixed rule alternatives merely require a determination whether the marriage has been dissolved. It does not make a great deal of difference where it was dissolved, and we can think of no reason why it should.

Perhaps, if the divorce were granted in an proceeding where both parties appeared the place of the divorce would make some difference; for some states permit support to be awarded after such a divorce and some states do not. But in such a case, it seems likely that full faith and credit will determine what the remaining rights of the parties are.

If the above inquiry is coupled with the supposition that the obligee (or wife) was the divorce plaintiff, then the question becomes important; for Chief Justice Traynor has opined that full faith and credit requires nonrecognition of a post-divorce right of support if the law of the divorce forum terminated the plaintiff's right of support upon rendition of the decree.

8. Did the divorcing court have personal jurisdiction over both parties?

Since we are dealing with ex parte divorce under the proposed statutes, all alternatives have nothing to say about divorces granted in proceedings where personal jurisdiction over both spouses was obtained. We know of no problem the California courts have encountered with such decrees. Full faith and credit seems to take care of all of the problems. The only question that might arise so far as we are aware is what California should do with a decree from a state where the court has power to award support at a later time despite the lack of a support award in the original decree. That question has not arisen yet in the California cases. It would be possible to answer it in our statute, but we see no compelling reason to do so.

9. Could personal jurisdiction over both parties have been obtained?

The Commission has previously decided that this factor should have no bearing on the later right to support. The proposed alternatives are based on this view. The argument in support of the Commission's decision appears at page 5 of the tentative recommendation.

10. Did the divorce decree award support to the divorce action plaintiff?

Question 10 is relevant only if we are dealing with a divorce decree granted by a court with jurisdiction over both parties; for the decree is not binding on the defendant so far as its support order is concerned unless he was personally served.

11. Did the divorce decree specifically deny support to the divorce action plaintiff?

12. Was the divorce decree silent as to support?

- 13. Does the divorce decree purport to settle the issue of support conclusively
 - (a) under its own law?
 - (b) under all law?

law 14. Is the divorce decree modifiable under the divorcing jurisdiction's

- (a) without limitation?
- (b) within limits -- e.g., upon a showing of changed circumstances?

These questions all direct our attention to the effect of the decree under the law of the jurisdiction where rendered. If it terminates the right to support, Chief Justice Traynor thinks (we do, too) that full faith and credit requires denial of a later right to support to the divorce action plaintiff. If the support action plaintiff was not a party to the divorce litigation, on principle (as well as constitutional grounds) the decree should have no effect on the support right.

We don't think that we have to reexamine the California cases modifying and enforcing binding, but modifiable, decrees in order to solve the problems arising out of divorce decrees that are not binding for support purposes.

- 15. Is California bound to give full faith and credit to
- (a) the divorce decree?
- (b) the law of the divorcing state?
- (c) the law of any other state--e.g., the domicile(s) of one (or both) of the parties?

This inquiry is relevant to the choice of law rule made. As a matter of policy, our choice of law rule should harmonize with the rules of full faith and credit so that the total law of post-divorce support will be consistent. We don't think, however, that the inquiry has any effect on the desirability of adopting fixed choice of law rules.

For example, if the constitution requires California to deny support to a former wife who obtained a divorce in a state that denies post-divorce support, we should not adopt a statute that declares a different rule.

Our present tentative recommendation does. The other alternatives, however, do not.

16. Should California give greater effect to the divorce decree than it may be required to give--for example, should California, as a matter of public policy, give any other jurisdiction's divorce decree at least as much res judicata effect as it would give a similar decree of its own?

This inquiry seems to be raising the question whether we should bar a claim for post-divorce support when the ex parte decree (obtained by the support action plaintiff) did not bar a later claim for support. The answer of all fixed rule alternatives is "No." If the support action plaintiff was not a party to the divorce decree, the inquiry is irrelevant, for the decree could have no effect on the support right.

17. Should some support cases be decided by declining, on grounds of public policy, to hear the case or to apply particular sister-state or foreign laws?

We can conceive of no support cases brought by former wifes or former husbands that a California court would want to turn down on such a ground. Perhaps some rare case involving a polygamous marriage might come along where California would feel that its public policy requires a denial of support. But the possibility of some such rare case arising does not seem to us to be any substantial reason to deny certainty to the overwhelming number of cases that actually do arise.

Conclusion

We do not think that the inquiries mentioned above indicate that a fixed choice of law rule will not work or may cause "injustice" in a particular case. On the contrary, we think that more hardship will be created by the uncertainty that will be left in the law if we do not adopt a fixed rule.

The above inquiries, however, do bring forth considerations and policies that should affect the rule adopted.

For example, take questions 1-5. Suppose a couple separates, later divorces, and H brings a support action in California. Upon what should his rights depend?

If at the time of the separation, the couple lived in a state that did not require wives to support husbands should California now require such support because H now lives in California?—because H lived in California at the time of the divorce?

If the couple lived in California at the time of separation, should this dictate a different conclusion?

We ask you to think what H's rights were at the time of the divorce; for we think his rights should be fixed as of that time. Unless W at that time lived in a state that required wives to support husbands, or unless W was accidentally found passing through California, H had no right of support. To proceed against W, he would have to go to her state to sue or proceed under the Reciprocal Act. In either event, the law of her state would be applicable—and since under that law he had no right of support, he had no such right at the time of the divorce.

Should the fact that an ex parte divorce was obtained by either party change the rule? We do not think it should. Since his right to support was measured by the law of the wife's domicile prior to the divorce, we think the same law should provide the measure of the support right after the divorce.

Alternatives 1 and 2 are both contrary. Under #1, upon the divorce we now determine all rights under California law. Under #2, we determine the support rights under the law of H's domicile, even though he had no effectual rights under that law prior to the dissolution of the marriage.

Both 1 and 2 require application of, for example, California law to create support obligations on the part of former wives who have never lived here or had any connection with the state. We think it is reasonable for the California Legislature to tell California citizens what they must do; we think it is somewhat presumptive for the Legislature to attempt to tell wives all over the country what they must do merely because a former husband moved to California.

We, of course, recommend alternative 3 (or some modification thereof) on Exhibit II (yellow). If the Commission does not prefer that alternative, we would prefer Professor McDonough's recommendation that choice of law rules be omitted from the statute.

But in any event, we think the Commission can and ought to choose among the available options.

Respectfully submitted,

Joseph B. Harvey Assistant Executive Secretary

relating to

THE RIGHT OF A FORMER SPOUSE TO MAINTAIN AN ACTION FOR SUPFORT AFTER

AN EX PARTE DIVORCE

BACKGROUND

In 1953, the California Supreme Court held in Dimon v. Dimon, 40 Cal.2d 516, 254 P.2d 528 (1953), that a former wife whose marriage was terminated by a divorce granted by a Connecticut court that did not have personal jurisdiction over her husband could not subsequently maintain an action for support against her former husband in California. The court reasoned that, in the absence of a valid alimony award in a divorce action, the right to support under California law is dependent upon the existence of a marriage. Hence, the divorce judgment that terminated the marriage also terminated the wife's right to support that was dependent thereon.

The California Law Revision Commission was then authorized to study the ramifications of the Dimon case to determine whether the law stated therein should be revised. The Commission commenced its study; but before completion of the Commission's work, the Supreme Court decided Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959), which overruled the decision in Dimon v. Dimon.

^{1.} In Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942), the United States Supreme Court held that a court of one state may validly grant a divorce to a domiciliary of that state despite the lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant, and the United States Constitution requires other states to give full faith and credit to the divorce judgment insofar as it terminates the marriage. Such a divorce judgment is referred to in this recommendation as an "ex parte divorce."

Hudson v. Hudson involved a wife who had commenced a divorce action against her husband in California. While the action was pending, the husband obtained a decree of divorce from an Idaho court that did not have personal jurisdiction over the wife. The Supreme Court held that notwithstanding the Idaho decree the wife could maintain her California action as an action merely for support instead of as an action for divorce and support.

The Hudson decision has remedied at least some of the problems created by the Dimon decision. The United States Supreme Court has also supplied the answers to some of the problems presented by the Dimon decision. See Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957). These cases seem to have settled the following matters:

- 1. A divorce judgment granted by a court without personal jurisdiction over the wife cannot cut off whatever right to support the wife has under the law of her domicile. Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957).
- 2. Whether the right of a wife to support survives the termination of the marital status by exparte divorce depends on the law of the wife's domicile at the time of the divorce. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959).
- 3. Under California law, a wife's right to support survives an exparte divorce obtained by the husband. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959).

Despite these cases, several problems remain.

First, there is no clear holding that a wife's right of support under California law survives an exparte divorce obtained by her. The Dimon case held that a wife relinquishes her right to support by seeking the divorce. Because the Dimon case was overruled in the Hudson case, it may be inferred that this holding is no longer the law in California; but neither the Hudson case nor any subsequent appellate case has had occasion to so hold because none has involved a former wife seeking support after an exparte divorce where she had been the divorce plaintiff.

Second, even if it is assumed that a wife's right of support under California law survives an ex parte divorce obtained by her as a general rule, it is uncertain whether her right to support survives such a divorce in a case where she could have obtained personal jurisdiction over her husband in the divorce action but failed to do so. It is at least arguable that she should be prohibited from "splitting" her cause of action and seeking support in a separate proceeding when all of the issues between the parties might have been settled in the divorce proceeding.

Third, it is not clear from the Hudson decision what form of action should be brought to enforce the continuing duty of support. The problem was not present in the Hudson case, for there a divorce action had already been commenced and provided the vehicle for awarding support. But is is uncertain whether grounds for divorce must be shown as a condition for obtaining such relief. See, e.g., Weber v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.2d 403, 2 Cal. Rptr. 9, 348 P.2d 572 (1960), where the former wife brought a divorce action to obtain support despite the dissolution of the marriage by ex parte divorce nearly three years before.

Fourth, the grounds upon which an action for support following an exparte divorce may be contested are not clear. The dissenting opinion in the overruled Dimon case suggested that the husband may contest the merits of the divorce, not for the purpose of setting it aside, but for the purpose of defeating the claim for support; however, there is no clear authority to that effect. Moreover, the law to be applied in determining whether there is a defense to a claim for support is uncertain.

^{2.} For convenience of reference, in this recommendation, "husband" is used to refer to a spouse owing a duty of support and "wife" is used to refer to a spouse to whom a duty of support is owed. It should be remembered, however, that in some cases the wife will have a duty to support her husband. CIVIL CODE § 243.

Fifth, during a marriage, a husband may bring a divorce action and, if personal jurisdiction is secured over the wife, be freed from any further duty to support the wife. Under existing California law, a court with jurisdiction over both parties may not order a husband to support his wife when the husband is awarded a divorce and no divorce or separate maintenance decree is awarded to the wife at the same time. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Following the termination of a marriage by an ex parte divorce, however, a husband no longer has an action for divorce available to terminate the duty of support. Hence, some other form of action is needed so that the possibility of being required to support the wife can be ended before the witnesses necessary to establish the husband's defense to such an action have disappeared.

RECOMMENDATION

To resolve these problems, the Law Revision Commission recommends the enactment of legislation embodying the following principles:

1. The right of a former spouse to support following a divorce decreed by a court which had jurisdiction to terminate the marriage, but did not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse (referred to hereinafter as "ex parte divorce") should be made statutory so that the nature and limits of the right can be settled without awaiting the numerous appeals necessary to provide the courts with opportunities to do so.

- 2. A former spouse should have a right to obtain support following an ex parte divorce whether the person seeking support was the plaintiff or the defendant in the divorce action. If the husband was the divorce plaintiff, the divorce judgment should not affect the wife's right to support, for the wife was not before the court and had no opportunity to litigate the question. Neither should the right to support be affected if the wife was the divorce plaintiff. No desirable public policy is served by forcing a wife who needs support to maintain a relationship that is a marriage in name only as the price of retaining her right to support from a husband who cannot be served personally in the state of her domicile.
- 3. The right to support should not be affected by an exparte divorce where the wife was the divorce plaintiff and could have secured personal jurisdiction over the husband but failed to do so. To bar a claim for support on such a ground would require the court in the later support action to determine whether the plaintiff knew or with reasonable diligence could have determined the defendant's whereabouts at the time of the divorce action, had reason to believe that the defendant would remain there until service could be made, and could reasonably have procured service upon him at that place. It is undesirable to create a technical defense, not going to the merits of the support right, that rests on such an uncertain factual base and involves such difficult problems of proof. Of course, a subsequent action for support should be barred if the cause of action could have been asserted in a previous action where both of the interested parties were personally before the court. Such a determination may be made by looking at the record of the previous action. But the subsequent support action should not be barred when the defendant was not actually before the court in the divorce action.

4. There should be no right to support following an ex parte divorce if the former husband could have defeated a claim for support in any divorce or separate maintenance action that might have been brought against him under the law of this state at the time of the divorce.

Requiring the application of California law to determine the defenses to a post-divorce claim for support eliminates needless complexity in the statute as well as the need for trial judges to make extensive searches to find remote details in the law of other states. As most of the cases arising in the California courts will involve California residents, the California law would be the applicable law in most cases even if a complex rule based on the domicile, residence, or presence of the parties were adopted. Cf., Hiner v. Hiner, 153 Cal. 254, 94 Pac. 1044 (1908) (nonresident wife may sue California husband for separate maintenance under California law). And in the few cases that might arise under a more complex rule involving application of another state's laws, the substantive law to be applied would rarely vary substantially from California law; for the law of support, at lease insofar as it pertains to husbands and wives, does not vary greatly from state to state.

- 5. The right to support, when not terminated by an exparte divorce, should be terminated thereafter under some circumstances. If the wife remarries, there should be no further right to look to the original husband for support thereafter. In addition, since an action for support looks to the equity side of the court for relief, any other conduct on the part of the wife such that it would be inequitable to require the husband to provide further support should be sufficient to terminate the support obligation.
- 6. It should be made clear that an action to enforce support rights that continue after an ex parte divorce may be brought under either the Uniform

Civil Liability for Support Act (CIVIL CODE §§ 241-254) or the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (CODE CIV. PROC. §§ 1650-1692). It should not be necessary to proceed under the statutes governing the award of support in divorce or separate maintenance actions.

- 7. A former husband should be granted the right to bring an action after an ex parte di orce to obtain an adjudication that his duty to support his former wife has ended.
- 8. In any action in which the court might adjudge that the right to support after ex parte divorce has been terminated, service on the civil legal officer of the county where the wife resides should be required before the court has jurisdiction to render a judgment. This will preclude the granting of a judgment terminating the duty to support in a friendly suit designed primarily to shift the husband's support burden to the local tax rolls.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The Commission's recommendations would be effectuated by enactment of the following measure:

An act to add Title 4 (commencing with Section 270) to Part 3 of Division 1 of the Civil Code, relating to liability and rights to support.

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Title 4 (commencing with Section 270) is added to Part 3 of Division 1 of the Civil Code, to read:

TITLE 4. SUPPORT FOLLOWING EX PARTE DIVORCE

§ 270. Definitions

270. As used in this title:

- (a) "Ex parte divorce" means a judgment, recognized in this state as having terminated the marital status of the parties, which was rendered by a court that did not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse.
- (b) "Obligor" means a person who owes or is claimed to owe a duty of support to his spouse or former spouse.
- (c) "Obligee" means a person to whom a duty of support by his spouse or former spouse is owed or is claimed to be owed.

Comment. "Ex parte divorce" is defined here to permit convenient reference in the remainder of the title. The definition requires that the divorce be effective to terminate the marriage. Hence, a divorce judgment made by a court without jurisdiction to terminate the marriage is not an "ex parte divorce" within the meaning of this title. A spouse wishing to obtain support after such a divorce can sue for divorce or separate maintenance inasmuch as the marriage still exists.

The definitions of "obligor" and "obligee" are based on similar definitions that appear in the Uniform Civil Liability for Support Act (see CIVIL CODE § 241) and the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (see CODE CIV. PROC. § 1653).

§ 271. Right to support following ex parte divorce

271. The duty of one spouse to support the other is not terminated by or after an exparte divorce except as provided in Sections 272 and 273.

Comment. Section 271 states the existing law that the right of a spouse to support from the other spouse is not terminated by an ex parte divorce. See Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959). Limitations on the right to support following ex parte divorce are stated in Sections 272 and 273.

§ 272. When right to support terminated by ex parte divorce

272. The duty of one spcuse to support the other is terminated by an exparte divorce if at the time of the divorce the obligee would not have been entitled to obtain support from the obligor in a divorce or separate maintenance action brought under the laws of this state.

Comment. Under California law, there are several defenses to a claim for support made by one spouse against the other. A husband abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified by his misconduct in abandoning him. CIVIL CODE § 175. Similarly, a wife is not required to support her husband, even though he is in need of support, if he has deserted her. CIVIL CODE § 176. A husband is not liable for his wife's support when they are living separately pursuant to an agreement that does not provide for her support. CIVIL CODE § 175. An obligor spouse may not be required to support the other if the obligor is granted a divorce on the ground of the obligee's marital misconduct and the obligee fails to show that the obligor is also guilty of marital misconduct. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Cf., Salvato v. Salvato, 195 Cal. App.2d 869, 16 Cal. Rptr. 263 (1961). And if both spouses are guilty of marital misconduct, a California court considers the equitable doctrine of "clean hands" in determining whether a claim for support may be enforced. De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952); Taylor v. Taylor, 197 Cal. App.2d 781, 17 Cal. Rptr. 512 (1961).

Under Section 272, if at the time of the ex parte divorce the obligor spouse could have successfully resisted a claim for support on any of the above grounds or upon any other ground that would be recognized under California law, the ex parte divorce terminates any further duty of support. If the obligor spouse had no defense under California law to a claim for support at the time of the ex parte divorce, the duty of support continues under Section 271 and may be enforced in an appropriate action thereafter. But see Section 273 and the Comment thereto.

The dissenting opinion in Dimon v. Dimon, 40 Cal.2d 516, 526, 254 P.2d 528 (1953), suggests that the constitutional requirement of full faith and credit forbids this state from recognizing an obligee's right of support after an ex parte divorce if the obligee was the divorce plaintiff and under the law of the state granting the divorce the right of support does not survive divorce. If so, the Constitution provides an obligor spouse with another defense to a post-divorce claim for support in addition to those mentioned in Sections 272 and 273.

The dissenting opinion in the Dimon case also asserted that if the obligor obtained the exparte divorce and under the law of the obligee's domicile the right to support was lost when the marriage status terminated, the obligee could not, by migrating to another state, revive the right that had expired. 40 Cal.2d at 540-541. Inasmuch as the Dimon decision was overruled in an opinion written by the author of the Dimon dissent (Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959)), this assertion in the dissent may now represent the law in California. If so, Section 272 modifies the law by providing a former spouse with a right of support regardless of whether such right was lost under the law of some other state when the marriage status terminated.

§ 273. When right to support terminated following ex parte divorce

273. The duty of one spouse to support the other, when not terminated by an exparte divorce, is terminated thereafter if:

- (a) The obligee remarries; or
- (b) It would be inequitable to require the obligor to furnish support to the obligee.

Comment. Section 272 prescribes conditions under which the right of a spouse to support is terminated at the time of an exparte divorce. Section 273 prescribes the conditions under which the right of a spouse to support is terminated at a later time.

Subdivision (a) is self-explanatory. Subdivision (b) is included in recognition that the duty to support is enforced by the equity side of the court. Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 542, 46 Pac. 509 (1896); Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265 (1869). Cf. De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952). Hence, the duty should not be enforced when it would be inequitable to do so. The circumstances under which it might be inequitable to enforce the duty to support will vary from case to case, and the statute would unduly confine the courts if it attempted to state in detail what inequity is contemplated.

Illustrative of the defenses that are available under subdivision (b) is the equitable defense of laches. Although no statute of limitations runs on the duty of support (the duty is a continuing one), a court might deem it inequitable to enforce such a duty after a long period has elapsed without any assertion of a claim for support. Similarly, a court might deem it inequitable to uphold a claim for support by a former wife who lives with a man without marrying him in order to avoid the defense provided in subdivision (a).

§ 274. Action to enforce duty to support

274. The duty of support following an ex parte divorce may be enforced in an action brought under the provisions of Title 3 (commencing with Section 241) of this part or Title 10a (commencing with Section 1650) of Part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Comment. Section 274 clarifies the nature of the action to be used to enforce the duty to support following an exparte divorce. It provides that an action for such support may be maintained under either the Uniform Civil Liability for Support Act (CIVIL CODE §§ 241-254) or the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (CODE CIV. PROC. §§ 1650-1692). Hence, it is unnecessary to proceed under the laws relating to actions for divorce and separate maintenance to enforce the post-divorce duty to support.

§ 275. Action to terminate duty to support

275. Any person whose marriage has been terminated by an ex parte divorce may bring an action against his former spouse to obtain a determination that his duty to support such spouse was terminated by or after the ex parte divorce.

Comment. The defenses to an action for support after an ex parte divorce that are stated in Sections 272 and 273 may prove illusory if the obligor is unable to obtain an adjudication of his duty to support when the witnesses necessary to establish those defenses are still available. During a marriage, an obligor spouse may cut off any further duty to support the obligee spouse by obtaining a divorce in an action where the obligee is personally served. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Section 275 provides the obligor with a comparable right after the marriage has been terminated by an ex parte divorce. Under Section 275, a spouse potentially liable for support may initiate the action to determine whether there is any further obligation to support. He need not vait until he is sued and attempt to establish his defenses at that time.

§ 276. Maintenance pendente lite

276. In any action brought to enforce a duty of support after an ex parte divorce, and in any action brought to obtain a determination that a duty of support was terminated by or after an ex parte divorce, the court may order the obligor to pay any amount that is necessary for the support and maintenance of the obligee during the pendency of the action, including the costs of suit and attorney's fees necessary for the prosecution or defense of the action. Any such order may be enforced by the court by execution or by such order or orders as, in its discretion, it may from time to time deem necessary. Any such order may be modified or revoked at any time during the pendency of the action except as to any amount that may have accrued prior to the order of modification or revocation.

Comment. A court has inherent power to order the payment of temporary support during the pendency of any action to obtain permanent support. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959); Kruly v. Superior Court, 216 Cal. App.2d 589, 31 Cal. Rptr. 122 (1963); Hood v. Hood, 211 Cal. App.2d 332, 27 Cal. Rptr. 47 (1962). Hence, Section 276 is technically unnecessary. It is included in this title, however, to eliminate any question concerning the power of the court to order such support in actions brought under this title.

§ 277. Service on county civil legal officer

277. In any action brought to enforce a duty of support after an ex parte divorce, and in any action brought to obtain a determination that a duty of support was terminated by or after an ex parte divorce, the court shall not have jurisdiction to render a judgment until 30 days after the county counsel, or the district attorney in any county not having a county counsel, of the county in which the obligee resides, if he is a resident of this state, has been served with notice of the pendency of the action.

Comment. Section 277 is included in this title in order that the county in which an obligee resides may be aware when the obligee's right to support is about to be terminated. Sometimes the county will have subrogation rights that may be affected, and sometimes a friendly action to terminate a duty to support may be instituted in order to preclude subrogation rights from arising in the immediate future. See CIVIL CODE § 248.

Notice to the county is required, therefore, to provide it with an opportunity to protect its rights. Section 277 is similar to Civil Code Section 206.6.

relating to

THE RIGHT OF A FORMER SPOUSE TO MAINTAIN AN ACTION FOR SUPPORT AFTER

AN EX PARTE DIVORCE

BACKGROUND

In 1953, the California Supreme Court held in Dimon v. Dimon, 40 Cal.2d 515, 254 P.2d 528 (1953), that a former wife whose marriage was terminated by a divorce granted by a Connecticut court that did not have personal jurisdiction over her husband could not subsequently maintain an action for support against her former husband in California. The court reasoned that, in the absence of a valid alimony award in a divorce action, the right to support under California law is dependent upon the existence of a marriage. Hence, the divorce judgment that terminated the marriage also terminated the wife's right to support that was dependent thereon.

The California Law Revision Commission was then authorized to study the ramifications of the Dimon case to determine whether the law stated therein should be revised. The Commission commenced its study; but before completion of the Commission's work, the Supreme Court decided Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959), which overruled the decision in Dimon v. Dimon.

^{1.} In Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942), the United States Supreme Court held that a court of one state may validly grant a divorce to a domiciliary of that state despite the lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant, and the United States Constitution requires other states to give full faith and credit to the divorce judgment insofar as it terminates the marriage. Such a divorce judgment is referred to in this recommendation as an "ex parte divorce."

Hudson v. Hudson involved a wife who had commenced a divorce action against her husband in California. While the action was pending, the husband obtained a decree of divorce from an Idaho court that did not have personal jurisdiction over the wife. The Supreme Court held that notwithstanding the Idaho decree the wife could maintain her California action as an action merely for support instead of as an action for divorce and support.

The Hudson decision has remedied at least some of the problems created by the Dimon decision. The United States Supreme Court has also supplied the answers to some of the problems presented by the Dimon decision. See Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957). These cases seem to have settled the following matters:

- 1. A divorce judgment granted by a court without personal jurisdiction over the wife cannot cut off whatever right to support the wife has under the law of her domicile. Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957).
- 2. Whether the right of a wife to support survives the termination of the marital status by exparte divorce depends on the law of the wife's domicile at the time of the divorce. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Col.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959).
- 3. Under California law, a wife's right to support survives an exparte divorce obtained by the husband. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959).

Despite these cases, several problems remain.

First, there is no clear holding that a wife's right of support under California law survives an exparte divorce obtained by her. The Dimon case held that a wife relinquishes her right to support by seeking the divorce. Because the Dimon case was overruled in the Hudson case, it may be inferred that this holding is no longer the law in California; but neither the Hudson case nor any subsequent appellate case has had occasion to so hold because none has involved a former wife seeking support after an exparte divorce where she had been the divorce plaintiff.

Second, even if it is assumed that a wife's right of support under California law survives an exparte divorce obtained by her as a general rule, it is uncertain whether her right to support survives such a divorce in a case where she could have obtained personal jurisdiction over her husband in the divorce action but failed to do so. It is at least arguable that the should be prohibited from "splitting" her cause of action and seeking support in a separate proceeding when all of the issues between the parties might have been settled in the divorce proceeding.

Third, it is not clear from the Hudson decision what form of action should be brought to enforce the continuing duty of support. The problem was not present in the Hudson case, for there a divorce action had already been commenced and provided the vehicle for awarding support. But is is uncertain whether grounds for divorce must be shown as a condition for obtaining such relief. See, e.g., Weber v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.2d 403, 2 Cal. Rptr. 9, 348 P.2d 572 (1960), where the former wife brought a divorce action to obtain support despite the dissolution of the marriage by ex parte divorce nearly three years before.

Fourth, the grounds upon which an action for support following an exparte divorce may be contested are not clear. The dissenting opinion in the overruled Dimon case suggested that the husband may contest the merits of the divorce, not for the purpose of setting it aside, but for the purpose of defeating the claim for support; however, there is no clear authority to that effect. Moreover, the principle seems questionable, for if the husband proves that the divorce was improperly granted, it seems that he has proved that the marriage should still be in existence and, hence, that he should still owe a duty of support as an incident thereof.

^{2.} For convenience of reference, in this recommendation, "husband" is used to refer to a spouse owing a duty of support and "wife" is used to refer to a spouse to whom a duty of support is owed. It should be remembered, however, that in some cases the wife will have a duty to support her husband. CIVIL CODE § 243.

Fifth, during a marriage, a husband may bring a divorce action and, if personal jurisdiction is secured over the wife, be freed from any further duty to support the wife. Under existing California law, a court with jurisdiction over both parties may not order a husband to support his wife when the husband is awarded a divorce and no divorce or separate maintenance decree is awarded to the wife at the same time. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal.

App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Following the termination of a marriage by an ex parte divorce, however, a husband no longer has an action for divorce available to terminate the duty of support. Hence, some other form of action is needed so that the possibility of being required to support the wife can be ended before the witnesses necessary to establish the husband's defense to such an action have disappeared.

RECOMMENDATION

To resolve these problems, the Law Revision Commission recommends the enactment of legislation embodying the following principles:

1. The right of a former spouse to support following a divorce decreed by a court which had jurisdiction to terminate the marriage, but did not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse (referred to hereinafter as "ex parte divorce") should be made statutory so that the nature and limits of the right can be settled without awaiting the numerous appeals necessary to provide the courts with opportunities to do so.

- 2. A former spouse should have a right to obtain support following an ex parte divorce whether the person seeking support was the plaintiff or the defendant in the divorce action. If the husband was the divorce plaintiff, the divorce judgment should not affect the wife's right to support, for the wife was not before the court and had no opportunity to litigate the question. Neither should the right to support be affected if the wife was the divorce plaintiff. No desirable public policy is served by forcing a wife who needs support to maintain a relationship that is a marriage in name only as the price of retaining her right to support from a husband who cannot be served personally in the state of her domicile.
- 3. The right to support should not be affected by an ex parte divorce where the wife was the divorce plaintiff and could have secured personal jurisdiction over the husband but failed to do so. To bar a claim for support on such a ground would require the court in the later support action to determine whether the plaintiff knew or with reasonable diligence could have determined the defendant's whereabouts at the time of the divorce action, had reason to believe that the defendant would remain there until service could be made, and could reasonably have procured service upon him at that place. It is undesirable to create a technical defense, not going to the merits of the support right, that rests on such an uncertain factual base and involves such difficult problems of proof. Of course, a subsequent action for support should be barred if the cause of action could have been asserted in a previous action where both of the interested parties were personally before the court. Such a determination may be made by looking at the record of the previous action. But the subsequent support action should not be barred when the defendant was not actually before the court in the divorce action.

4. There should be no right to support following an exparte divorce if the former husband could have defeated a claim for support in any action that might have been brought against him at the time of the divorce.

Under existing California law, a husband can successfully defeat a claim for support in a divorce action by successfully asserting a claim for divorce while defeating his wife's request for a divorce or separate maintenance decree. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Cf. Salvato v. Salvato, 195 Cal. App.2d 869, 16 Cal. Rptr. 263 (1961). And if both spouses are guilty of marital misconduct, a husband can defeat a claim for support if he can persuade the court that, in the light of the doctrine of "clean hands," it would be inequitable to require him to continue to support his wife after the dissolution of the marriage.

De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952); Taylor v. Taylor, 197 Cal. App.2d 781, 17 Cal. Rptr. 512 (1961). Other defenses to a claim for support by one spouse against another are provided in Sections 175 and 176 of the Civil Code. A husband should not lose the right to assert these defenses merely because the marital relationship has been ended by an exparte divorce.

- 5. The right to support, when not terminated by an ex parte divorce, should be terminated thereafter under some circumstances. If the wife remarries, there should be no further right to look to the original husband for support thereafter. In addition, since an action for support looks to the equity side of the court for relief, any other conduct on the part of the wife such that it would be inequitable to require the husband to provide further support should be sufficient to terminate the support obligation.
- 6. It should be made clear that an action to enforce support rights that continue after an ex parte divorce may be brought under either the Uniform

Civil Liability for Support Act (CIVIL CODE §§ 241-254) or the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (CODE CIV. PROC. §§ 1650-1692). It should not be necessary to proceed under the statutes governing the award of support in divorce or separate maintenance actions.

- 7. A former husband should be granted the right to bring an action after an ex parte di orce to obtain an adjudication that his duty to support his former wife has ended.
- 8. In any action in which the court might adjudge that the right to support after ex parte divorce has been terminated, service on the civil legal officer of the county where the wife resides should be required before the court has jurisdiction to render a judgment. This will preclude the granting of a judgment terminating the duty to support in a friendly suit designed primarily to shift the husband's support burden to the local tax rolls.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The Commission's recommendations would be effectuated by enactment of the following measure:

An act to add Title 4 (commencing with Section 270) to Part 3 of Division 1 of the Civil Code, relating to liability and rights to support.

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Title 4 (commencing with Section 270) is added to Part 3 of Division 1 of the Civil Code, to read:

TITLE 4. SUPPORT FOLLOWING EX PARTE DIVORCE

§ 270. Definitions

- 270. As used in this title:
- (a) "Ex parte divorce" means a judgment, recognized in this state as having terminated the marital status of the parties, which was rendered by a court that did not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse.
- (b) "Obligor" means a person who owes or is claimed to owe a duty of support to his spouse or former spouse.
- (c) "Obligee" means a person to whom a duty of support by his spouse or former spouse is owed or is claimed to be owed.

Comment. "Ex parte divorce" is defined here to permit convenient reference in the remainder of the title. The definition requires that the divorce be effective to terminate the marriage. Hence, a divorce judgment made by a court without jurisdiction to terminate the marriage is not an "ex parte divorce" within the meaning of this title. A spouse wishing to obtain support after such a divorce can sue for divorce or separate maintenance inasmuch as the marriage still exists.

The definitions of "obligor" and "obligee" are based on similar definitions that appear in the Uniform Civil Liability for Support Act (see CIVIL CODE § 241) and the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (see CODE CIV. PROC. § 1653).

§ 271. Right to support following ex parte divorce

271. The duty of one spouse to support the other is not terminated by or after an exparte divorce except as provided in Sections 272 and 273.

Comment. Section 271 states the existing law that the right of a spouse to support from the other spouse is not terminated by an exparte divorce. See Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959). Limitations on the right to support following exparte divorce are stated in Sections 272 and 273.

§ 272. When right to support terminated by ex parte divorce

272. The duty of one spouse to support the other is terminated by an exparte divorce if at the time of the divorce the obligee would not have been entitled to obtain support from the obligor in a divorce per separate maintenance, or any other action that could be brought under the-laws-ef-this-state to obtain such support.

Comment. Under existing law, there are several defenses to a claim for support made by one spouse against the other. A husband abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified by his misconduct in abandoning him. CIVIL CODE § 175. Similarly, a wife is not required to support her husband, even though he is in need of support, if he has deserted her. CIVIL CODE § 176. A husband is not liable for his wife's support when they are living separately pursuant to an agreement that does not provide for her support. CIVIL CODE § 175. An obligor spouse may not be required to support the other if the obligor is granted a divorce on the ground of the obligee's marital misconduct and the obligee fails to show that the obligor is also guilty of marital misconduct. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Cf., Salvato v. Salvato, 195 Cal. App.2d 869, 16 Cal. Rptr. 263 (1961). And if both spouses are guilty of marital misconduct, a California court considers the equitable doctrine of "clean hands" in determining whether a claim for support may be enforced. De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952); Taylor v. Taylor, 197 Cal. App.2d 781, 17 Cal. Rptr. 512 (1961).

Under Section 272, if at the time of the ex parte divorce the obligor spouse could have successfully resisted a claim for support on any of the above grounds or upon any other ground, the ex parte divorce terminates any further duty of support. If the obligor spouse had no defense to a claim for support at the time of the ex parte divorce, the duty of support continues under Section 271 and may be enforced in an appropriate action thereafter. But see Section 273 and the Comment thereto.

Section 272 deals only with the question when a right of support is ended by an ex parte divorce as a matter of substantive California law. In some cases, California law will be inapplicable. For example, it may be inappropriate to apply California law if both parties are nonresidents of California. It may also be inappropriate to apply California law if there is no right or duty of support under the law of another state where one of the parties resides. The dissenting opinion in Dimon v. Dimon, 40 Cal.2d 516, 526, 254 P.2d 528 (1953), suggests that the constitutional requirement of full faith and credit requires this state to apply the law of the state where the divorce was granted and recognize the termination of the right of support if the obligee was the divorce plaintiff and under the law of the divorcing state the right of support did not survive the divorce decree. The dissenting opinion in the Dimon case also suggests that if the obligor obtained the ex parte divorce and under the law of the obligee's domicile the right to support was lost when the marriage status terminated, the California courts will apply that law so that the obligee may not, by migrating from state to state, revive the right that had expired. 40 Cal.2d 540-541.

Because of the varied factors that must be considered in each case to determine what is the applicable law, Section 272 declares only the California substantive law and leaves the determination of the question when that law should be applied for the courts to determine.

§ 273. When right to support terminated following ex parte divorce

273. The duty of one spouse to support the other, when not terminated by an exparte divorce, is terminated thereafter if:

- (a) The obligee remarries; or
- (b) It would be inequitable to require the obligor to furnish support to the obligee.

Comment. Section 272 prescribes conditions under which the right of a spouse to support is terminated at the time of an exparte divorce. Section 273 prescribes the conditions under which the right of a spouse to support is terminated at a later time.

Subdivision (a) is self-explanatory. Subdivision (b) is included in recognition that the duty to support is enforced by the equity side of the court. Gaston v. Gaston, 11/2 Cal. 542, 46 Pac. 509 (1896); Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 255 (1869). Cf. De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952). Hence, the duty should not be enforced when it would be inequitable to do so. The circumstances under which it might be inequitable to enforce the duty to support will vary from case to case, and the statute would unduly confine the courts if it attempted to state in detail what inequity is contemplated.

Illustrative of the defenses that are available under subdivision (b) is the equitable defense of laches. Although no statute of limitations runs on the duty of support (the duty is a continuing one), a court might deem it inequitable to enforce such a duty after a long period has elapsed without any assertion of a claim for support. Similarly, a court might deem it inequitable to uphold a claim for support by a former wife who lives with a man without marrying him in order to avoid the defense provided in subdivision (a).

§ 274. Action to enforce duty to support

274. The duty of support following an ex parte divorce may be enforced in an action brought under the provisions of Title 3 (commencing with Section 241) of this part or Title 1Ca (commencing with Section 1650) of Part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Comment. Section 274 clarifies the nature of the action to be used to enforce the duty to support following an exparte divorce. It provides that an action for such support may be maintained under either the Uniform Civil Liability for Support Act (CIVIL CODE §§ 241-254) or the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (CODE CIV. PROC. §§ 1650-1692). Hence, it is unnecessary to proceed under the laws relating to actions for divorce and separate maintenance to enforce the post-divorce duty to support.

§ 275. Action to terminate duty to support

275. Any person whose marriage has been terminated by an exparte divorce may bring an action against his former spouse to obtain a determination that his duty to support such spouse was terminated by or after the exparte divorce.

Comment. The defenses to an action for support after an ex parte divorce that are stated in Sections 272 and 273 may prove illusory if the obligor is unable to obtain an adjudication of his duty to support when the witnesses necessary to establish those defenses are still available. During a marriage, an obligor spouse may cut off any further duty to support the obligee spouse by obtaining a divorce in an action where the obligee is personally served. Hager v. Hager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Section 275 provides the obligor with a comparable right after the marriage has been terminated by an ex parte divorce. Under Section 275, a spouse poventially liable for support may initiate the action to determine whether there is any further obligation to support. He need not until be is sued and attempt to establish his defenses at that time.

an ex parte divorce, and in any action brought to obtain a determination that a duty of support was terminated by or after an ex parte divorce, the court may order the obligor to pay any amount that is necessary for the support and maintenance of the obligee during the pendency of the action, including the costs of suit and attorney's fees necessary for the prosecution or defense of the action. Any such order may be enforced by the court by execution or by such order or orders as, in its discretion, it may from time to time deem necessary. Any such order may be modified or revoked at any time during the pendency of the action except as to any amount that may have accrued prior to the order of modification or revocation.

Comment. A court has inherent power to order the payment of temporary support during the pendency of any action to obtain permanent support. Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 344 P.2d 295 (1959); Kruly v. Superior Court, 216 Cal. App.2d 589, 31 Cal. Rptr. 122 (1963); Hood v. Hood, 211 Cal. App.2d 332, 27 Cal. Rptr. 47 (1962). Hence, Section 276 is technically unnecessary. It is included in this title, however, to eliminate any question concerning the power of the court to order such support in actions brought under this title.

§ 277. Service on county civil legal officer

277. In any action brought to enforce a duty of support after an ex parte divorce, and in any action brought to obtain a determination that a duty of support was terminated by or after an ex parte divorce, the court shall not have jurisdiction to render a judgment until 30 days after the county counsel, or the district attorney in any county not having a county counsel, of the county in which the obligee resides, if he is a resident of this state, has been served with notice of the pendency of the action.

Comment. Section 277 is included in this title in order that the county in which an obligee resides may be aware when the obligee's right to support is about to be terminated. Sometimes the county will have subrogation rights that may be affected, and sometimes a friendly action to terminate a duty to support may be instituted in order to preclude subrogation rights from arising in the immediate future. See CIVIL CODE § 248.

Notice to the county is required, therefore, to provide it with an opportunity to protect its rights. Section 277 is similar to Civil Code Section 206.6.

§ 272. When right to support terminated by ex parte divorce

- 272. The duty of one spouse to support the other is terminated by an exparte divorce if:
- (a) Under the law of the obligee's domicile at the time of the divorce, the obligee's right to support, if any, is terminated by the exparte divorce;
- (b) Under the law of the obligor's domicile at the time of the divorce, the obligor could not be ordered to provide for either the present or future support of the obligee in a divorce action, separate maintenance action, or any other action to obtain such support;
- (c) The obligee unjustifiably abandoned the obligor and has not offered to return prior to the divorce; or
- (d) The obligee is living separate from the obligor at the time of the divorce pursuant to an agreement that does not provide for support to the obligee.

Comment. Section 272 states the conditions under which a spouse's right to support is terminated by an exparte divorce.

Subdivision (a) apparently states the existing law as indicated in Hudson v. Hudson, 52 Cal.2d 735, 740, 344 P.2d 295 (1959).

Subdivision (b) provides that there is no right to support following an exparte divorce if the obligor spouse could not have been held liable under the law of his domicile for the obligee's support if sued personally at the time of the divorce.

For example, under California law, a husband abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified by his misconduct in abandoning him. CIVIL CODE § 175. Similarly, a wife is not required to support her husband, even though he is in need of support, if he has deserted her. CIVIL CODE § 175. A husband is not liable for his wife's support when they are living separately pursuant to an agreement that does not provide for her support. CIVIL CODE § 175. An obligor spouse may not be required to support the other if the obligor is granted a divorce on the ground of the obligee's marital misconduct and the obligee fails to show that the obligor is also guilty of marital misconduct. Hager v. Rager, 199 Cal. App.2d 259, 18 Cal. Rptr. 695 (1962). Cf., Salvato v. Salvato, 195 Cal. App.2d 869, 16 Cal. Rptr. 263 (1961). And if both spouses are guilty of marital misconduct, a California court considers the equitable doctrine of "clean hands" in determining whether a claim for support may be enforced.

De Burgh v. De Burgh, 39 Cal.2d 858, 250 P.2d 598 (1952); Taylor v. Taylor, 197 Cal. App.2d 781, 17 Cal. Rptr. 512 (1961).

Under Section 272, if at the time of the ex parte divorce the obligor spouse resided in California and could have successfully resisted a claim for support on any of the above grounds or upon any other ground that would be recognized under California law, the ex parte divorce terminates any further duty of support. But if the obligor spouse had no defense under California law to a claim for support at the time of the ex parte divorce, the duty of support would continue under Section 271 and would be enforceable in an appropriate action thereafter. But see Section 273 and the Comment thereto.

If the obligor spouse resided in another state at the time of the exparte divorce, Section 272 would require a similar application of that state's laws to determine whether the obligor could have been held liable for the obligee's support.

Subdivisions (c) and (d) make certain defenses that would be applicable under California law to an action for support during marriage applicable to an action for support following an exparte divorce. See CIVIL CODE §§ 175, 176.

STUDY NO. 51 - RIGHT TO SUPPORT AFTER EX PARTE DIVORCE

The Commission considered Memorandum 65-72 and the first and second supplements thereto.

Mr. McDonough made an extended oral statement in elaboration and supplementation of the first supplement. He urged:

- (1) That the Commission not include in any legislation it recommends on this subject any provisions indicating what law should be applied (i.e., legislative choice of law rules);
- (2) That the Commission include in any legislation it recommends on this subject substantially the following provision:

The provisions of this fittle are to be applied only when the law of this state is applicable to the case. Whether the law of this state is applicable is a question of law to be decided by the court;

(3) That the Commission limit the legislation it recommends on this subject to the substantive and procedural rules which should be applied in those eases in which a court determines that California law is applicable.

In support of this position Mr. McDonough recounted in some detail the considerable changes which have been generally urged by the commentators and adopted by the courts of a number of states in recent years insofar as choice of law is concerned. These changes have, he said, been generally in the direction of departing from broad, general choice of law rules (such as place of injury, place of making of a contract, situs of property, and place of domicile) in favor of modes of decision which emphasize the factual relationship of particular states with particular cases (herein of "contracts" and "Genter of gravity"), and the governmental interest (or lack thereof) of particular states in having their laws applied to particular cases. Mr. McDonough stated that, while he has reservations about many of these departures, they do seem pretty clearly to be the order of the day and that it seems to him very doubtful, indeed, that the legislatures ought to step in at this point to stifle the current judicial trend in this area by the enactment in statutory form of the very kind of broad, general choice of law rules that the courts are clearly trying to get away from. He also gave illustrations of hypothetical support-after-ex-parte-divorce-decree-cases in which, in his opinion, the application of the kind of choice of law rules which either the Commission or its staff now appear to have in contemplation would make little if any sense, given the remote connection of the jurisdiction whose law would thus be applied with any of the parties as of the time of its application--leading him to conclude that the very considerations which have led the courts increasingly to abandon broad, general choice of law rules are no less applicable in these cases than in other kinds of cases in which the courts have found them unsatisfactory. Finally, Mr. McDonough pointed out what he believes are a number of open questions relating to the application of the Full Faith and Credit Clause and other Constitutional provisions in this area,

Minutes - Regular Meeting November 18, 19, and 20, 1965

the existence of which he believes both complicates and makes additionally unwise any attempt to deal with the complex choice of law problems involved with legislatively enacted choice of law rules of a broad general nature. He argued that, taking these considerations into account, the Commission should leave choice of law in this area to the courts unless and until there is demonstrated a need, in the form of badly decided cases, for legislative intervention and should confine its recommendations to a body of rules that would produce sound results in those cases in which the courts determine that California law should be applied.

After Mr. McDonough's views and arguments had been discussed, a motion was duly made, seconded and adopted that the position he had urged should not be accepted by the Commission at this time and that the staff should be directed to continue its work on Study No. 51 on the hypothesis that the Commission's recommendation on this subject will include provisions relating to what state's law is to be applied. Mr. McDonough voted against the motion.

THE RIGHT OF A FORMER SPOUSE TO SUPPORT AFTER AN EX PARTE DIVORCE

INTRODUCTION

In a series of cases beginning in 1955, the California Supreme Cours has held that a former wife may maintain an action to obtain permanent support from her former husband if the marriage was dissolved by a divorce decree rendered by a court that did not have personal jurisdiction over her. The Supreme Court has reasoned that the divorce court's lack of personal jurisdiction over the wife precludes the divorce court from making any binding adjudication affecting her marital support rights.

This study will explore the ramifications of these decisions to determine whether there are unresolved legal problems in the area of post-divorce support and, if so, whether such problems can be solved legislatively. The study will consider both federal and sister-state law to the extent that they bear on the question of what the California law is or ought to be.

THE MARIMAL RIGHT OF SUPPORT

Because the basis of the holdings that a former wife has a post-divorce right of support has been that the pre-divorce support rights are unaffected by a divorce decree rendered by a court without personal jurisdiction over hear, the stray of post-divorce support rights appropriately begins with an examination of a spouse's pre-divorce support rights.

Caldifornia

Under existing California law, a husband is required to support his wife 3 to the extent of his ability to do so. He is not required to provide such support, however, when she has abandoned him without just cause; nor is he required to provide such support when she is living separate from him pursuant to an agreement that does not provide for her support. The husband's obligation to support his wife is independent of her need for that support, and he can be required to provide her with support commensurate with his station in life even though she is not dependent on him at all and has ample means of her own.

The wife, too, has the duty to support her husband under existing 6

California law. She is obligated to provide such support, however, only when "he has not deserted her" and he is "unable, from infirmity, to support 7 himself."

The duty of a spouse to provide support to the other may be specifically 8 enforced by an action brought for that purpose during the marriage. Civil Code Section 137 seems to provide that a court may award separate maintenance only if the spouse seeking support establishes a cause for divorce or willful desertion or willful nonsupport by the defendant spouse. It is well established, however, that a spouse may obtain a decree specifically enforcing the duty of support despite the fact that the grounds specified by statute for divorce or separate maintenance cannot be established.

A separate maintenance decree may be modified to increase the support awarded or to lengthen the period for which support is required; and it is unnecessary for the court to reserve jurisdiction in order to exercise this ll power of modification.

Other states

At common law, a husband was required to support his wife; but the wife 12 had no duty to support her husband.

The Commissioners on Uniform State Laws reported in 1964 that all American jurisdictions retain the rule requiring the husband to support his wife (in Texas the liability is for necessities only) and that 27 American jurisdictions now require the wife to support her husband when he is in need.

Although the common law denied a spouse the right to bring an action for 14 support. virtually all American jurisdictions will judicially enforce the obligation to support either through a statutory action for separate maintenance or through an action in equity independent of statute. Most states regard the action for separate maintenance as equitable in the sense that a court of equity has inherent power to entertain the proceeding. In such jurisdictions, statutes authorizing support actions are not regarded as restrictions on the inherent powers of the equity court. Some states. however, limit a spouse to the statutory conditions for relief upon the theory that the action was unknown to the common law and the right to separate maintenance is necessarily limited, therefore, by the statute that created the right.

Interstate problems

These differing duties of support would cause few problems if married persons would stop migrating from state to state. But inasmuch as the American population is highly mobile, support problems frequently arise that involve the laws of more than one jurisdiction.

Marital support rights pursuant to judgment. Let us consider first the situation where a support decree is made in one state and the decree is sought 19 to be enforced in another state.

Section 1 of Article IV of the United States Constitution provides that "Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State." The United States Supreme Court has held that a judgment for support, or separate maintenance, must be accorded by the various states "the same binding force that it has in the state in which it was originally given." If the support award is payable in future installments, the right to such installments "becomes absolute and vested upon becoming due, and is therefore protected by the full faith and credit clause." If, however, the support award is modifiable by the court that rendered the decree, full faith and credit need not be accorded to the decree.

The full faith and credit clause, however, does not forbid a court from 23 enforcing a modifiable decree rendered by a court of another state. If a modifiable decree is to be enforced by another state, due process requires that the defendant be given notice and the opportunity to litigate the question 24 of modification. The state of California will enforce modifiable decrees 25 for support after trying the issue of modification on the merits.

The Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act was promulgated by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1950, and it 26 has been twice revised by the National Conference since then. In either its original or an amended form it has been enacted in every American jurisdiction except New York, and New York has enacted a Uniform Support of Dependents 27 Law that is similar. It seems likely that modifiable decrees will be enforceable under the provisions of the Reciprocal Act. If this is so, then despite the Supreme Court's refusal to apply the full faith and credit clause to modifiable support decrees, such decrees are enforceable in virtually all American jurisdictions.

Thus far we have considered the enforceability of a support decree in a state other than that where the decree was rendered. We must now consider the negative force of a support decree—the extent to which such a decree will bar another action for support in a different jurisdiction.

To the extent that the original decree is modifiable (as in California), it seems clear that a support decree cannot bar further relief for the second court has the power to modify the decree. But if the original decree is not modifiable, a more difficult problem is presented.

No decision of the United States Supreme Court has been found that involves 30 the specific problem; but Yarborough v. Yarborough, decided in 1933, involved substantially the same issue. That case involved a Georgia couple who were divorced in Georgia. The Georgia decree ordered the husband to pay a lump sum support award to the wife for the support of their child. Under Georgia law, compliance with the Georgia decree fully discharged the husband's support obligation to the child, and no subsequent judgment for support could be rendered against him. Thereafter, the mother and child migrated to South Carolina; and about 1 1/2 years later, the child sued her father in South Carolina for additional support. The defendant father appeared personally in the South Carolina action.

The majority opinion (by Mr. Justice Brandeis) held that the Constitution required South Carolina to give the Georgia judgment the same faith and credit that the judgment would have in Georgia. Accordingly, the South Carolina court could not order the defendant father to pay any additional support to his child, for to do so would deny full faith and credit to the Georgia judgment.

Justices Stone and Cardozo dissented in an opinion by Justice Stone. The dissent argued that South Carolina's interest in its domiciliary minor should enable it to regulate the incidents of the parent-child relationship within South Carolina. The Georgia judgment should be considered merely as regulating the incidents of the parent-child relationship within Georgia. It should not be read as purporting to regulate the relationship in places outside of Georgia where the parties might later come to reside.

The Yarborough decision thus indicates that the full faith and credit clause forbids a court from granting further support to a spouse who has exhausted her support rights under an unmodifiable support decree rendered by a court of another state.

Marital support rights where no prior judgment. So far we have considered interstate problems that exist when a support award is sought after a previous support decree has been made. We now consider interstate problems where there has been no previous support decree. Such problems may arise when either the spouse seeking support or the spouse from whom support is sought—or neither—resides in the state where the support action is brought.

Most states will entertain an action for separate maintenance brought by 31 a nonresident spouse against a spouse who is resident in the state. Few cases have involved the issue, but apparently the cases are divided on whether a support action can be maintained where neither spouse is resident in the 32 state of the forum.

In California, residence is not a jurisdictional requirement in separate maintenance actions. No California case has been found involving two nonresident spouses; but a dictum indicates that California would entertain a support action even though neither spouse were a resident of the state. Dimon v. Dimon was a support action involving two nonresidents. was decided in part on the ground that an ex parte divorce previously awarded to the plaintiff terminated the plaintiff's right to support from the defendant. The portion of the opinion relating to the effect of an ex parte divorce upon the marital right of support has been overruled. But the case also held that an action for support could be maintained on behalf of a nonresident child against a nonresident father. The dissenting opinion in Dimon contended that support could be awarded to the former wife regardless of the fact that both parties were nonresident. Since the majority opinion in Dimon was overruled in an opinion by the author of the Dimon dissent, it is at least arguable that the views expressed in that dissent now constitute the law of California. This conclusion seems doubly warranted because even the majority in Dimon held that relief could be granted against the nonresident father on behalf of the nonresident child and did not suggest that the nonresidence of the former spouses was a bar to relief as between them. Moreover, Civil Code Section 244 now provides that "An obligor present or resident in this (enacted in 1955) State has the duty of support as defined in this title regardless of the presence or residence of the obligee." Thus, it seems reasonably clear that, under California law, a nonresident spouse may maintain an action for support against the other nonresident spouse.

In a concurring opinion, the Chief Justice of the New Hampshire Supreme Court has pointed out that those states that hold to the rule barring support actions by nonresidents are preserving a rule that is out of harmony with recent statutory developments in those states. All American jurisdictions

now have enacted reciprocal enforcement of support legislation that permits a spouse who is resident in one state to begin a support action in that state that ultimately will be enforced against the other spouse in another state.

Thus, all states will now entertain a support action brought by a nonresident spouse pursuant to the procedures specified in the reciprocal support legisla tion. States retaining the rule that support actions can be maintained only by residents, therefore, merely require the spouse seeking support to remain out of state and sue under the reciprocal act instead of permitting the spouse to recover in a direct intrastate action where both parties are before the same court.

What law is to be applied in a support action between spouses who reside in different jurisdictions?

The few cases that have considered choice of law problems in support of dependents litigation seem to establish the following propositions: (1) A state will enforce a duty of support imposed by its own laws upon a resident of the state despite the nonresidence of the person to whom the duty of support 41 is owed. (2) A state will enforce a duty of support arising under the law of another state when the person from whom support is claimed is a resident 42 of that other state. (3) A state will not enforce against one of its own 43 residents a duty of support imposed by the laws of another jurisdiction.

Illustrative of the foregoing propositions is the 1958 Texas case,

State of California v. Copus. That was a case brought by the State of California to recover the cost of supporting the defendant's mother in a California mental hospital. The defendant was liable for such support under 45

California law, but the Texas court held that there was no comparable Texas 146 law requiring the child to support his parent. During the period that the defendant's mother was confined in the California mental hospital, the defendant moved his domicile from California to Texas. The Texas court held that California could recover from the defendant for the period during which he was a California resident, but California could not recover upon the obligation imposed by its laws for the period during which the defendant was a Texas resident. The original version of Section 7 of the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act provided:

Duties of support enforceable under this law are those imposed or imposable under the laws of any state where the alleged obligor was present during the period for which support is sought or where the obligee was present when the failure to support commenced, at the election of the obligee. 47

48

Although both California and Texas had enacted this version of Section 7, the Texas court dismissed it from consideration on the ground that California's action was not being prosecuted under the reciprocal act.

In Commonwealth v. Mong, the Ohio Supreme Court held that Section 7 of the reciprocal support act, which had been enacted in Ohio, could not constitutionally require an Ohio defendant to support a Pennsylvania dependent as required by Pennsylvania law when Ohio law did not require the defendant to provide such support.

In 1952, the Uniform Law Commissioners amended the above quoted provision of the reciprocal support act to read:

Duties of support applicable under this law are those imposed or imposable under the laws of any state where the obligor was present during the period for which support is sought. The obligor is presumed to have been present in the responding state during the period for which support is sought until otherwise shown.⁵¹

All American jurisdictions except New York (New York has comparable legislation)
52
have enacted the Uniform Act; but only four states--California, Massachusetts, Mississippi, and Texas--have retained the substance of the originally recommended
52.1
Section 7.

ţ

The meaning of the currently recommended version is not altogether clear. Its lack of clarity is indicated in the following hypothetical cases: California requires a wife to support her husband when he is in need, Arizona does 53 not. Suppose W leaves her needy husband, H, in California and establishes a separate residence first in California and then in Arizona. If H sues for past and future support under the reciprocal act, Section 7 may mean that W can be held liable for all past and future support because she was present in California for a portion of the period for which support is sought. On the other hand, Section 7 may mean that W can be held liable for H's past support for that period while she was still present in California but that she cannot be held liable for H's support for the period of her Arizona residence. Under this latter view, W could not be liable for future support; but under the former view, W could be held liable for future support because of her presence in California for a portion of the period for which support is sought.

Suppose, then, that W continues to support H until after she has established an Arizona residence. Then she terminates her support and H sues under the reciprocal support act. Under these facts, W was not present in California for any portion of the period for which support is sought; hence, under any interpretation of the section, W cannot be held liable for H's support, for H's claim for support does not cover any period of time during which W was present in California.

Suppose, further, that W did not terminate her support to H until after establishing an Arizona residence, but she returned to California at a later time on a weekend trip. Does the weekend in California revive the entire claim of H for support because of W's presence in California for a portion of the period--the weekend--for which support is sought?

Finally, the wording of Section 7 suggests that it could be H's claim for support—not his right to support—that fixes the period used to determine the applicable state law. Section 7 provides that the duty of support is that imposed or imposable under the law of any state where the obligor was present during the period "for which support is sought." Does this mean that if H seeks support for the period that W was a California resident—even though he is not entitled to support for that period—that the California law can be applied to determine W's duty of support, but that if H does not make his nonmeritorious claim Arizona's law must be applied?

We suggest that an interpretation of Section 7 that ties the duty of support to nonmeritorious allegations in the plaintiff's pleading is unsound. We suggest, too, that an interpretation of Section 7 that ties the duty of support to the fortuity of whether W has ever passed through any state that requires wives to support needy husbands is unsound. We think that the reciprocal act is concerned with the presence of the parties during the period for which support is sought. Under this view, W would be liable for H's past support—and Arizona would be required to enforce H's claim—for that period during which W was a California resident. But W would not be liable for H's support for that period during which she was an Arizona resident. W would not be liable for future support as long as she remained an Arizona resident.

That this interpretation is the correct one seems to be supported by the 54 Commissioners' Note, which indicates that revised version is based on concepts and principles set forth in an article by Dean Stimson of the University of Idaho Law School that appeared in the American Bar Association Journal 55 in 1950. In that article, Dean Stimson argued that the proper rule to be applied in determining personal rights and duties between persons in different states is that "the applicable law is the law to which the person alleged to be under a duty was subject at the significant time and not the law to which the person claiming the right was subject."

It should be noted, too, that Dean Stimson's article argues that choice of 57 law rules should be based on physical presence, not domicile. It is arguable, therefore, that the use of the word "presence" in Section 7 of the revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act was intended to mean physical presence, not domicile. Nonetheless, some commentators on the uniform act 58 seem to interpret the section as referring to residence or domicile. Under this interpretation, Section 7 merely states in statutory form the substance of the Texas court's holding in the Copus case. Since this view will be easier to administer than an interpretation based on an accounting of every minute of the obligor's time, it is not unlikely that courts will come to the same conclusion as the commentators as to the meaning of Section 7.

It is clear, therefore, that under the law of all but the four American jurisdictions retaining the original version of Section 7, the duty of one spouse to support the other must be determined under the law of the state where the spouse from whom support is sought is "present" or resides. And even in Texas, which retains the original version of Section 7, the determination of the applicable rule is made in the same way unless enforcement is sought under its provisions of the reciprocal support act.

THE EFFECT OF DIVORCE

Thus far, we have considered the rights and duties of support that arise out of marriage. We must now determine what effect divorce has upon these rights and duties. We will consider the effect of both divorces granted by courts with personal jurisdiction over both spouses and divorces granted by courts with personal jurisdiction over one spouse only.

Divorce granted by court with personal jurisdiction over both spouses

California. Civil Code Section 139 authorizes a California court to require a person against whom a divorce decree is granted to pay a suitable allowance to the party to whom the divorce is granted for support and maintenance. Under familiar principles of due process, such an order for support is not binding on the party required to provide the support unless the court 60 had personal jurisdiction over him.

In theory, the allowance permitted by Section 139 is not a continuance of the marital right of support. It is considered to be compensation to the injured spouse for the loss suffered as a result of the other's breach 61 of the obligations of the marital relationship.

Accordingly, support may not be awarded under Section 139 to the party 62 against whom is granted a decree of divorce. If both parties are granted a divorce, or if one is granted a divorce and the other a decree of separate maintenance, the court may award support to either party after considering the 63 application of the equitable doctrine of "clean hands." A court is without jurisdiction to award support to a party against whom a divorce is granted unless that party is also granted a divorce or separate maintenance 64 decree in the same proceeding. Even if a separate maintenance decree has been granted to a spouse, if a divorce is later granted against that spouse, the rights arising under the prior separate maintenance decree cease.

There is an exception to the rules stated in the preceding paragraph. A divorce granted on the ground of incurable insanity does not relieve the spouse to whom the divorce is granted from any duty of support that arises out of the marital relationship.

In requiring support to be paid pursuant to Section 139, the court is required to consider the circumstances of both parties. The need of the spouse requesting support as well as the ability of the other spouse to provide support must be considered. A support order made pursuant to Section

139 may be modified or revoked by the court as to support installments that have not yet accrued, but Section 139 forbids the modification or revocation of any support order as to amounts that have accrued prior to the order of modification or revocation.

If a court makes no award of support under Section 139 in a divorce decree, it lacks the power to modify the decree to provide for support at 70 a later time. Similarly, a decree providing support for a limited time may not be modified after the expiration of such time to provide for 71 additional support. However, a court may make an award of a nominal sum in order to retain jurisdiction to modify the decree to provide for 72 additional support at a later time.

Other states. The purpose of this study does not require an extensive analysis of the laws of other states. It is sufficient for our purpose to note how the laws of the several states differ from the law of California.

In a few states, a divorce terminates the right to support; hence, a 73 court cannot grant permanent alimony as an incident to a divorce decree.

In those states where alimony can be granted as an incident of divorce, it is usually regarded as being based on the marital right of support and not as 74 compensation to the injured spouse. In some states, support may be awarded 75 to a guilty spouse. In some states a support order may be modified both as to accrued support installments and as to unaccrued support installments.

And, a few states permit a court to modify a divorce decree to provide for support even though no support order was made in the original decree and the court did not expressly reserve jurisdiction to make a support order at a 77 later date.

Interstate problems. Where there has been a divorce decree rendered containing an order for support, the problems presented are no different in kind than those presented by a separate maintenance order; and the discussion appearing above at pages 4-6 is apposite.

Where there has been a divorce decree, containing no order for support, rendered by a court of a state--such as California--where the decree bars any subsequent support award, the full faith and credit clause of the United States Constitution probably bars any subsequent support award by a court of 78 another state.

Where the divorce court lacks power to pass on a claim for support, the decree will not bar a subsequent claim for support made to a court of another 79 state.

If the original divorce decree were rendered by a court of a state--such as New Jersey--where a subsequent support order is not barred by the failure of the court to award support in the original divorce action, several tenable views may be advanced as to the propriety of a subsequent support claim made in the courts of another state.

If one accepts the argument that modifiable judgments should be subject to the full faith and credit clause, or even if the forum state generally enforces modifiable judgments as a result of its views of comity, it can be argued that the forum should decide the claim for support just as it would if it were a court of the state that granted the original divorce, whether or not either or both of the parties are still residents of the divorcing jurisdiction. That original divorce contemplated that the spouse from whom support is sought should provide support at a later time when such support became needful. The court did not reserve jurisdiction either expressly or by making a nominal support award because it was unnecessary to do so; nevertheless, the decree should be treated just as if the court had reserved jurisdiction to modify a nominal award, for that was the legal effect of the decree in the state where the decree was granted.

It may also be argued, however, that the divorce decree did not decide nor purport to decide the issue of future support. That matter was left at large and should be decided by application of the appropriate state laws as of the time when support is actually sought. In effect, the divorcing state's law requires a former spouse to support the other former spouse when the latter is in need. But this view of the requirements of public policy should not be forever binding on all of the other states in the union merely because the former spouses were domiciled there when the divorce was obtained. Unless the spouse from whom support is sought or the spouse seeking support still resides in a state requiring former spouses to provide support, there is no reason to apply the law of the state where the divorce was granted.

If the law of the divorcing state is not applied, the principles discussed above, pages 8-12, indicate that the applicable law should be the law of the state where the spouse from whom support is sought resides.

Ex parte divorce

The Supreme Court of the United States has thus far insisted that a divorce decree, to be accorded full faith and credit, must be awarded by a court of a state where at least one of the parties to the divorce is domiciled. It is unnecessary, however, for both parties to reside in that state; the divorce must be accorded full faith and credit even though the defendant spouse is not subject to the personal jurisdiction of the court, so long as 81 the plaintiff spouse is a domiciliary of the state of the divorcing court.

In this study, a divorce granted by a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over both spouses, but that has power to enter a decree that must be given full faith and credit insofar as it terminates the marriage, is referred to as an "ex parte divorce."

Our inquiry at this point is as to the effect of an ex parte divorce upon the rights and duties of support that were incident to the marriage. In this portion of the study, interstate problems will not be discussed separately. Instead, the attitude of the California courts toward interstate problems and the law of other states on interstate problems will be discussed under the headings of "California" and "Other states." Because the purpose of this study is to identify California problems and to suggest possible California solutions, the law of California will be discussed last.

Other states. In Estin v. Estin, the United States Supreme Court held that a wife's rights under a separate maintenance decree granted by a New York court were unaffected by an exparte divorce granted to the husband by a Nevada court. Because the Nevada court lacked personal jurisdiction over the wife, the Supreme Court held that it lacked power to alter her rights under the New York judgment.

In Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, the United States Supreme Court held that a New York court could constitutionally award support to a former wife despite the fact that her former husband had been granted an exparte divorce by a Nevada court prior to the time she commenced her New York support action. The Supreme Court held that inasmuch as the wife was not subject to the Nevada court's jurisdiction, that court had no power to extinguish any right which she had under the law of New York to financial support from her husband.

These decisions were foreshadowed by concurring opinions that appeared 84 and Esenwein v. Commonwealth ex rel. Esenwein.

In the Esenwein case, the court affirmed an order of a Pennsylvania court enforcing a support decree although the husband had obtained a Nevada divorce after the support decree had been rendered and although, under Pennsylvania law, the obligation of a support order terminates with a subsequent divorce. The holding was based on a determination that the Nevada decree was void because the husband never acquired a Nevada domicile; but the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas (who had dissented in the second Williams case upon which the majority opinion relied) suggested that the decree of the Nevada court did not have to be accorded full faith and credit in an action for support.

The Armstrong case involved action for support brought by an ex-wife in Ohio against her former husband who had been previously granted a valid Florida divorce. The Supreme Court affirmed the Ohio support order on the ground that the Florida decree did not purport to adjudicate the wife's support rights; hence, the Ohio court did not actually deny full faith and credit to the Florida decree. Mr. Justice Black (for four concurring justices) argued that the Ohio court was not required to give full faith and credit to the Florida decree to the extent that the Florida decree purported to affect the wife's support rights.

Our view is based on the absence of power in the Florida court to render a personal judgment against Mrs. Armstrong depriving her of all right to alimony although she was a nonresident of Florida, had not been personally served with process in that State, and had not appeared as a party. It has been the constitutional rule in this country at least since Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, decided in 1878, that nonresidents cannot be subjected to personal judgments without such service or appearance. 87

So far as the federal cases are concerned, then, it appears that a divorce judgment cannot deprive a spouse of whatever right to support she may have as an incident of the marriage under the law of her domicile if she so is not personally subject to the jurisdiction of the divorce court.

The rationale of the federal cases seems to be as follows: The divorce court lacks power to make any binding adjudication of the absent spouse's support rights because of its lack of personal jurisdiction over that spouse. To adjudicate the absent spouse's support rights would be to deprive that 90 spouse of property without due process of law. Lacking due process, the 91 divorce judgment can be given no effect even in the state where rendered. Since the divorce judgment can be given no effect on support rights in the state where rendered, the full faith and credit clause--which requires that it be given the same effect elsewhere that it has in the jurisdiction 92 where rendered--does not require that it be given effect anywhere else.

Not discussed in these cases is whether the court where support is sought would be permitted to recognize the termination of the marriage for the purpose of determining whether support rights incident to the marriage have terminated.

The cases thus far have merely held that the state where support is sought can disregard the divorce and grant support. But, if the due process clause would forbid the state that granted the divorce from holding that the divorce decree terminated the support rights of the absent spouse because such a holding would deprive the absent spouse of property without due process of law, it seems that recognition of the termination of the marital status by another state as a basis for denying support is equally a deprivation of property without due process of law.

The concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas in the Esenwein suggests that the due process clause may require all courts to disregard an ex parte divorce decree when support is sought by a spouse who was not a party to the divorce action. The Esenwein case was decided the same day as the second Williams case. Mr. Justice Douglas dissented in the Williams case on the ground that the divorce decree was not subject to attack under Nevada law, hence, the full faith and credit clause protected it from attack under North Carolina law. The Esenwein case also involved a Nevada divorce; and, under the domestic law of Pennsylvania where the Esenwein case arose, the right to support does not survive divorce. Despite his views on the credit that should be accorded a Nevada divorce, Justice Douglas concurred in the Supreme Court's decision permitting Pennsylvania to enforce the former wife's right to support. From this, it may be inferred that he believed that the Pennsylvania court would be forbidden by the due process clause from holding that the wife's support right could be adversely affected by the ex parte Nevada divorce that terminated her marriage. 95

Further support for this view may be found in Griffin v. Griffin where the court held:

A judgment obtained in violation of procedural due process is not entitled to full faith and credit when sued upon in another jurisdiction. . . . Moreover, due process requires that no other jurisdiction shall give effect, even as a matter of comity, to a judgment acquired elsewhere without due process.96

Whatever implications may be derived from close analysis of the language of the various Supreme Court opinions, all that can be determined with certainty at the present time is that a state may require a person to support his former spouse despite a prior ex parte divorce if such former spouse was not subject to the personal jurisdiction of the divorcing court.

The states have adopted a variety of rules to cope with the problems 97 created by ex parte divorce. In some states, the courts hold that the right of support is incident to a marriage, and if the marriage is terminated--even by an ex parte divorce--the right of support that is incident thereto also terminates. Other states hold that the right to support survives an ex parte divorce if the former spouse who is seeking support was the divorce defendant; but they deny post-divorce support if the former spouse who seeks support was the divorce plaintiff. Other states draw no distinction based on the identity of the divorce plaintiff and hold that the right of support will survive an ex parte divorce obtained by either spouse.

These rules, of course, are subject to modification as the full faith and credit clause is found to be applicable. For example, it is clear now that a state granting an ex parte divorce cannot hold that a nondomiciliary defendant's right of support is terminated because the marriage to which it was an incident is also terminated. And, it seems likely that the full faith and credit clause requires all courts to deny post-divorce support to a former spouse who was the divorce plaintiff if, under the law of the state where the divorce was granted, the right of support does not survive an exparte divorce.

California. In 1946, a Connecticut court awarded Mrs. Sara Jane Dimon a divorce from her husband who was then a resident of New York. Mr. Dimon was not served personally in Connecticut and did not appear in the Connecticut proceeding. Soon thereafter, Mr. Dimon established a new home in Nevada, and Mrs. Dimon moved to Oregon. During one of Mr. Dimon's occasional visits to California, Mrs. Dimon sued him in California for her past and future support.

The case found its way to the California Supreme Court, which held that the Connecticut divorce terminated all of Mrs. Dimon's further right to support from Mr. Dimon. Despite the fact that neither party was a resident of California, the court based its decision on the absence of any provision in the California statutes for a separate maintenance action between parties who were no longer married to each other. There was no discussion of whether Mrs. Dimon was entitled to support under Connecticut, New York, Nevada, or Oregon law. Mr. Justice Traynor dissented. He argued that the Connecticut court's lack of personal jurisdiction over Mr. Dimon prevented Mrs. Dimon from prosecuting her support claim in the divorce action; hence, she should not be barred from prosecuting her support claim in a forum where personal jurisdiction over Mr. Dimon could be obtained. He opined that a former wife should not have a right to sue for support following an ex parte divorce if such an action could not be maintained in the courts of the state where she was domiciled at the time of the divorce. If she was the divorce plaintiff, full faith and credit would require the courts of this state to hold that the divorce ended her right to support, since the divorce would have that effect in the state where granted. If she was not the divorce plaintiff, but under the law of her domicile her right of support did not survive the ex parte divorce granted her husband, she should "not be allowed, by migrating to another state, to revive a right that had expired." But, if her right of support survived the divorce under the law of her domicile at the time of the divorce, she should be able to maintain an action to enforce that right in the California courts.

Mr. Justice Traynor's views in the Dimon case are significant, for he was the author of the majority opinions in the subsequent cases of Worthley v.

Worthley, Lewis v. Lewis, Hudson v. Hudson, and Weber v. Superior Court.

Worthley v. Worthley held that an action could be maintained in California on a modifiable New Jersey separate maintenance decree even though the defendant husband, subsequent to the New Jersey judgment, was granted an ex parte divorce in Nevada. In so holding, the court looked to the New Jersey law to discover whether the wife's rights under the separate maintenance decree survived the ex parte divorce.

Lewis v. Lewis involved an Illinois separate maintenance decree rendered after the defendant husband had been awarded an ex parte divorce in Nevada. Again, the Supreme Court held that California would enforce the Illinois decree. The Nevada divorce was entitled to full faith and credit on the question of the parties' marital status, but the Illinois judgment (which was not modifiable as to accrued installments) was entitled to full faith and credit on the question of the duty of support. That the wife's right of support survived the divorce under Illinois law was, of course, determined by the Illinois judgment.

Hudson v. Hudson involved a California wife who had commenced a divorce action in California. While the action was pending, her husband obtained an exparte Idaho divorce. Mrs. Hudson continued to prosecute her divorce action, however, as an action on the alimony claim alone. Although Dimon v.

Dimon could have been distinguished, the court overruled its Dimon decision.

Hudson held that the right of a wife to support following an exparte divorce must be determined by the law of the wife's domicile at the time of the divorce. Under California law, the right to support that is incident to a marriage continues when that marriage is dissolved by an exparte divorce.

Finally, in Weber v. Superior Court, the court held that a former wife could maintain a support action against her former husband although he had obtained an ex parte divorce long prior to the initiation of the support action.

From these cases, it seems clear that under California law a spouse's right of support survives an exparte divorce obtained by the other spouse. No California case since Dimon has actually involved a situation where the spouse seeking support was the divorce plaintiff. But in view of the fact that Dimon was overruled, not distinguished, it seems safe to say that California will recognize the survival of the marital support right regardless of the identity of the spouse obtaining the exparte divorce.

When the former spouse seeking post-divorce support was not domiciled in California at the time of the divorce, it seems fairly clear that the California courts will determine whether there is a post-divorce support right by looking to the law of the support-plaintiff's domicile as of the time of the divorce. It was by application of this choice of law rule that the court arrived at its decision in Worthley and in Hudson; and it was this choice of law rule that was advocated in the dissent to the overruled Dimon decision.

These cases seem to have solved most of California's substantive problems relating to the right to support after an exparte divorce. A few still remain, however.

It is apparent that California counsel do not know what kind of an action to bring to obtain support following an exparte divorce. In Weber 112

v. Superior Court, the plaintiff wife brought a divorce action despite the fact that the marriage had been dissolved by an exparte divorce almost three years previously.

It is not clear what defenses may be raised to defeat a claim for support following an exparte divorce. There is some language in the Dimon dissent suggesting that the support-defendant might contest the merits of the divorce action—not for the spurpose of attacking the divorce, but for the purpose of defeating the support claim. This suggestion seems ill-founded. Showing the divorce was improperly granted seems merely to show the continued existence 113 of the duty to support. As pointed out earlier, California law permits a court to award support in a divorce action even though it denies the divorce. California law also creates certain defenses to support actions brought during 114 marriage. It is not clear the extent to which these would be applicable to a claim for support following ex parte divorce.

The cases suggest no way in which a former spouse who could have defeated a support claim made during marriage or in a contested divorce action may initiate an action to obtain an adjudication of his support obligation following an exparte divorce. During the marriage, such a person could sue for divorce, and if successful could obtain a judgment forever cutting off a further claim 115 for the support of his spouse. The cases do not suggest any way in which a similar judgment might be obtained after an exparte divorce.

It will be recalled that the right of a spouse to obtain support from the other spouse is determined in most states by looking to the law of the obligor's domicile. The California cases indicate that whether the right

the law of the obligee's domicile as of the time of the divorce. It is not clear whether these rules are inconsistent or whether the courts are merely holding that survival of the right is determined by the law of the obligee's domicile even though the substance of the right itself may be determined by reference to the law of the obligor's domicile.

The California courts have not yet dealt with the question whether the right to support survives a divorce obtained by the wife in an ex parte proceeding even though she could have brought her husband under the personal jurisdiction of the court. It can be argued that she should be precluded from "splitting her cause of action" by proceeding only with the ex parte divorce when she could have litigated both her right to a divorce and her right to support in a single, adversary proceeding.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Without legislative guidance, the California Supreme Court can undoubtedly provide sound solutions for most of the remaining problems; but it will be years before the existing uncertaintiess will be eliminated by judicial decision. In the interim, persons entitled to support may be denied their rights, and persons entitled to be relieved from support obligations may be required to provide support, because there is not enough at stake in the particular case to warrant an appeal to the Supreme Court. If sound solutions can be conceived, therefore, the interest of the parties who are involved in these unfortunate domestic situations would be best served by the enactment of these solutions as statutes.

In this portion of the study, we will consider the extent to which various factors should be considered in determining whether there is or should be a post-divorce right of support and will recommend solutions to the problems that we have identified.

The identity of the divorce plaintiff. If the husband was the divorce plaintiff, and if the wife obtained a support decree from a court of a state which recognizes the continuance of her support rights following an exparte divorce, the full faith and credit clause requires this state to give the support decree the same effect that it has in the state where rendered and 118 enforce it against the husband. The divorce decree cannot affect any of 119 the wife's support rights under that decree.

Disregarding the full faith and credit clause, it seems unfair to a wife to permit a judgment to cut off her right of support when she did not have her day in court on the merits of that judgment. The social policy that impels a court to award support in a divorce proceeding when it has personal jurisdiction over the husband should also impel a court to award support if the first opportunity the wife has to assert her support right occurs after the husband has procured an exparte divorce. Since the courts have evolved rules that allow a husband readily to obtain a divorce, it is necessary to provide that such a divorce can have no effect on the support rights of a wife who is not subject to the personal jurisdiction of the court in order to protect the wife and prevent injustice.

If the wife was the divorce plaintiff, it can be argued that by obtaining the divorce she voluntarily surrendered her support right. Certainly, if the effect of the decree where rendered was to terminate her support rights, the full faith and credit clause requires this state to give the decree the same effect. But, unless the divorce is obtained in a jurisdiction that terminates support rights upon divorce, the argument that the wife has voluntarily surrendered her support rights seems unsound. If personal jurisdiction over the husband cannot be secured in the state where the wife is domiciled, it is impossible for the wife to litigate the question of support at the time of the divorce. To deny her the right to litigate that right later thus forever denies the wife her day in court and permits the husband, by deserting, to forever escape the obligations he incurred by his marriage. No desirable public policy is served by forcing a wife who needs support to choose between retaining a marital status which is a marriage in name only and retaining her right of support.

In the light of these considerations, it is recommended that a right of support should exist following an exparte divorce regardless of whether the wife or the husband was the divorce plaintiff.

Amenability of the divorce defendant to the personal jurisdiction of the divorce court. Under the law of some jurisdictions, it is possible for a plaintiff to determine by the manner in which he proceeds whether the defendant will be subject to the court's personal jurisdiction or not. In California, the problem can arise as follows: Code of Civil Procedure Sections 412 and 413 describe the conditions under which service by publication may be authorized and describe the procedure for serving by publication. Service by publication is authorized where the person to be served (1) resides out of the state, (2) has departed from the state, (3) cannot after due diligence be found within the state, or (4) conceals himself to avoid the service of summons. Service by publication is made by publishing the summons in a newspaper and, where the defendant's residence is known, by mailing a copy of the summons and complaint to the defendant. Personal service outside the state may be substituted for publication and mailing. A California court can acquire personal jurisdiction over a defendant who is a domiciliary of the state although the defendant is not served personally so long as the defendant has 120 not departed from the state. But Code of Civil Procedure Section 417 provides that, if service was made pursuant to Sections 412 and 413, a court has power to render a personal judgment against a person outside the state only if he was personally served with a copy of the summons and complaint and was a resident of the state (1) at the time of the commencement of the action, (2) at the time the cause of action arose, or (3) at the time of service.

Thus, a plaintiff wife whose husband is still a domiciliary of California, but whose whereabouts outside the state are known to the wife, may choose to serve the defendant either by publication and mailing or by personal service outside the state. If she chooses the former course, she cannot secure a personal judgment; but if she follows the latter course, she can.

The question is whether the plaintiff wife should lose the right to support after an ex parte divorce if she fails to proceed by way of personal service outside the state against a domiciliary husband who is out of the state. We suggest she should not.

To bar the subsequent claim in such a situation would require the court in the later case to probe the mind of the former wife to determine whether she knew of the defendant's whereabouts, had reason to suspect that he might move before personal service could be made, could reasonably procure personal service upon him at that place, etc.

No public policy is served by barring the wife's support claim in such a case. The husband is not twice vexed by support-seeking litigation--he was not required to and did not appear in the first case. If it would have been more convenient for him to litigate the support issue in the divorce action, he could have appeared and thus forced the litigation of the issue. No judicial determination is called in question by a person adversely affected thereby.

On the other hand, barring the wife's claim would require the support-court to determine whether she acted reasonably in proceeding as she did. She may have proceeded by publication because she did not know exactly where he was; she may not have desired to force him to return to the state because she believed that it would be more convenient for him to return later; she may have believed that he would move before she could transmit the court's process and have it served upon him. A wrong guess on her part as to how reasonable her actions would appear to a later court would cost her her right to support. There is no reason to rest her right to support on such a tenuous basis.

It is recommended, therefore, that res judicata should be applied to bar a post-divorce action for support only where the defendant was personally before the divorce court.

Choice of law

The California cases have held that whether the right of a wife to support survives an exparte divorce should be determined under the law of 121 her domicile at the time of the divorce. Under the law of most states, the substance of a spouse's right to support is determined under the law of 122 the other spouse's domicile. Our problem here is to determine whether either or both of these rules should be retained.

It is recommended that both of these choice of law rules be continued subject to the qualification that the law of the obligor's domicile at the time of the divorce should determine the substance of the support right thereafter.

Survival of the support right. If the wife was the divorce plaintiff, and under the law of her domicile the right to marital support does not survive divorce, the full faith and credit clause requires other states to 123 recognize that the support right is terminated by the divorce. If the husband is the divorce plaintiff, the divorce court is without power to adversely affect whatever right of support the wife has under the law of 124 her domicile.

Thus, the Constitution requires application of the law of the wife's domicile to determine whether her right of support survives ex parte divorce except in the case where the wife is the divorce plaintiff and under the law of her domicile the right of support survives divorce. Apparently, in this circumstance the courts would be free to apply the law of the husband's domicile. But inasmuch as policy considerations discussed above indicate that the right of support should survive an ex parte divorce procured by the wife, here too the most desirable law to choose is that of the wife's domicile at the time of the divorce.

Mhen the husband is the divorce plaintiff and the right of support does not survive under the law of the wife's domicile, it is uncertain whether the Constitution permits any court to hold that the right of support does not survive. It is arguable that the United States Supreme Court cases hold that an exparte divorce obtained by the husband cannot affect whatever right of support the wife had prior to the termination of the marriage under the law of her domicile, that for support purposes the divorce must be regarded as a nullity and the parties must be regarded as subject to all of their pre-divorce support rights and duties.

It is neither necessary nor desirable to attempt to predict whether the United States Supreme Court will permit the state of the wife's domicile to terminate her right to support upon termination of the marriage by an ex parte divorce procured by the husband. If a state can so terminate a right of support, it would be undesirable to permit that right to be revived merely by the migration of the wife to another state. If California provided by statute that an expired right to support could be revived simply by the migration of the obligee to California, the state could well become a haven for divorced wives who could not obtain relief in any other jurisdiction. A husband could never know whether he was free from his marital support obligation or not; for at any time his wife might move to California and commence a support action. His ability to plan for the future would be seriously impaired. As stated by Mr. Justice Schauer:

If there is to be a divorce at all it is the better public policy that the decree of divorce shall settle for all time the rights and obligations of the parties to the dissolved marriage to the end that litigation arising from such marriage shall end and be known to have ended, and that the parties may have an opportunity to build to a future, free from, and perhaps the better for, the past, rather than to be wrecked by recurring litigation. 125

If a state cannot validly terminate an obligee's right of support, a law so providing will eventually be held to be unconstitutional, and all states at the same time will be compelled to recognize the continuance of the marital support right. But since it is impossible to determine in advance of a decision on the question what the constitutional rule is, it is recommended that the legislatively prescribed rule require that in all cases the survival of the support right be determined by the law of the wife's domicile at the time of the divorce to guard against the eventuality that termination of the right upon an ex parte divorce obtained by the husband is constitutional.

The substance of the support right. If the survival of the marital support right is to be determined under the law of the obligee's domicile, should the substance of that right also be determined under the law of the obligee's domicile? The answer must be "No" unless the nature of the obligee's right is to be drastically changed by the ex parte divorce. It must be remembered that under the law of most states, the obligee's right of support l26 is determined by reference to the substantive law of the obligor's domicile. It is the right of support under the law of the obligor's domicile that survives the ex parte divorce.

Inasmuch as all states require husbands to support their wives, the choice of law is not too significant when it is the wife or former wife who is seeking support. But when it is a former husband who seeks support, the need to apply the substantive law of the obligor's domicile becomes glaringly apparent. Suppose this case: H and W live in Colorado (which does not require wives to support their husbands). They separate, H coming to California and W establishing residence in Arizona. While the marriage continues, H's right to support from W will be determined under Arizona law, for he can get a personal judgment against W only by suing her in Arizona or by proceeding under the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act, Arizona's version of which requires application of the law where the obligor 128 Since Arizona does not require wives to support their husbands, resides. H has no right of support while the marriage continues. When the marriage is dissolved by an ex parte divorce, should the law used to determine H's support right then be California's law (which requires wives to support their husbands) or should it still continue to be Arizona's law?

Since the theory of support following ex parte divorce is that the support rights incident to the marriage are unaffected by the ex parte divorce, Arizona law--the law of the obligor's domicile--should be applied to determine the post-divorce support right because the marital support right was determined under Arizona law. Moreover, it would be difficult to justify application of California law when the person required to perform under that law has (in the supposed case) never resided in California nor in any other state that required wives to support their husbands. As Professor Morris points out, it is short sighted to argue that California's interest in the economic interest of its domiciliary should be the predominate concern, for Arizona 130 is equally concerned with the economic interest of its domiciliary.

Accordingly, it is recommended that in those cases where the right of support, if any, survives ex parte divorce, the substantive law to be applied to determine the right of support should be the law of the obligor's domicile.

As of what time should the law of the obligor's domicile be determined-as of the time of the ex parte divorce or as of the time when support is sought?

It can be argued that the substantive law applicable should be determined as of the time of the ex parte divorce. The later action for support is authorized because the support rights incident to the marriage could not be determined at the time of the divorce. But, although these rights could not be determined at that time, when the parties are finally brought personally before the same court the court should attempt to determine the parties' support rights and obligations in the way that they should have been determined at the time of the divorce action. Moreover, if the parties are no longer married to each other, their rights and obligations should be viewed as of the time of the divorce so that they can plan for the future undeterred by any fear that their rights and obligations may change as they migrate from state to state.

On the other hand, it can be argued that the ex parte divorce should be totally disregarded insofar as support rights are concerned. Because the parties could not litigate their marital obligations in the ex parte divorce action, the fact that the action occurred and a divorce decree was rendered should be of no consequence when a later right of support is asserted. Hence, in the support action, the court should apply the same law that it would if the parties were still married—the law of the obligor's domicile during the period for which support is sought. If future support is sought, the applicable law should be the law of the obligor's domicile at the time of the support action.

Determining the applicable substantive law as of the time of the support action would tend to minimize the need for the support forum to determine the law of other states. It seems probable that few support actions will be brought against nonresident defendants because of the difficulty of obtaining personal jurisdiction. Hence, in most cases, the support forum would be applying its own substantive law of support.

Although we are not free from doubt, on balance we prefer requiring determination of the substantive support law as of the time of the divorce action. Defenses

If a husband is sued by his wife for support, under California law he can cross-complain for divorce. If he is successful on his cross-complaint, and if no divorce or separate maintenance decree is awarded to the wife at the same time, the court is powerless to order the husband to support the wife.

If both parties are granted divorces, whether one can be required to support the other is determined in accordance with the doctrine of "clean hands."

Apparently, too, equitable defenses may be raised against any action for 133 support, whether or not spouses or marital rights are involved.

Legislation regulating support after ex parte divorce should make clear that defenses such as these that may be asserted under the applicable substantive law may be asserted in defense against a post-divorce support claim.

Post-divorce support actions

Hudson v. Hudson suggests that the post-divorce right of support can be enforced in an independent action in equity. The suggestion has apparently been overlooked, for divorce actions have been brought to enforce the postdivorce right of support despite the fact that the marriage was already terminated. The Uniform Civil Liability for Support Act Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act provide statutory authority for interspousal support actions independent of the actions for divorce and separate maintenance. Since the theory under which post-divorce support actions may be maintained is that the marital right of support was undisturbed by the ex parte divorce, there is reason to believe that a support claimant may proceed under these acts after an ex parte divorce as well as before. It is recommended that a minor statutory adjustment be made in order to make it clear that these acts can be used to enforce the post-divorce right of support.

During a marriage, an obligor spouse has the right to bring an action for divorce and obtain an adjudication that his obligation to support the obligee spouse no longer exists. It would be unfair to an obligor to provide an obligee with a form of action to enforce post-divorce support and fail to provide the obligor with a form of action to terminate his post-divorce support obligations comparable to that which he has prior to divorce. courts have provided the obligee with a post-divorce support action. Legislative action, however, seems necessary to provide an obligor with a post-divorce action to obtain an adjudication of his support obligations.

Accordingly, it is recommended that legislation be proposed that would give a former spouse a right of action to terminate support obligations equivalent to that which he has during marriage.

Although the common law gave the wife a right of support, the common law rule forbidding one spouse from suing the other precluded her from bringing action to enforce her right. BROMLEY, FAMILY IAW 195 (2d cd. 1962). "The only legal reason why a husband should support his wife is, that she may not become a burden upon the parish. So long as that calamity is averted, the wife has no claim on her husband. And in fact she has no direct claim upon him under any circumstances whatever; for even in the case of positive starvation she can only call upon the parish for relief. And the parish authorities will insist that the husband shall provide for her, when he is able, to the extent at least of sustaining life. If the husband fail in this respect, so that his wife becomes chargeable to any parish, the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3 says, that 'he shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person, and shall be punishable with imprisonment and hard labor'." MACQUEEN, HUSBAND AND WIFE 42-43 (1848).

The common law permitted the wife to pledge the husband's credit in order to secure the necessities that he would not provide. But this was "a singularly inadequate remedy, for its efficacy depends upon her being able to find a tradesman who is prepared to give the credit asked for, and a husband who has failed in his obligation to his wife is hardly likely to be a satisfactory debtor." BROMLEY, FAMILY LAW 195 (2d ed. 1962).

- 46. The majority opinion seems incorrect on this point. The dissent quotes

 Texas Probate Code Section 423 as follows: "Where an incompetent has no estate of his own, he shall be maintained . . . by the children and grandchildren of such person respectively if able to do so" The parent was clearly incompetent, and the quoted Texas statute clearly imposed upon the defendant a duty of support. Since the State of California had discharged this duty of support, it could be argued that it became subrogated to the parent's right and could claim reimbursement from the defendant for expenses incurred in discharging the defendant's support obligation. See, Anno., 116 A.L.R. 1281, pointing out that most courts hold that a third party who provides assistance to someone in need can recover from the person whose failure to support created the need.

- 49. The dissenting opinion did not dismiss the reciprocal act so lightly. It regarded the enactment of the reciprocal act as a declaration of policy by the Texas Legislature. This seems to be the sounder view. The majority opinion makes the substantive right to relief depend upon the procedure used to enforce that right. The California Supreme Court in an analogous situation has relied on the reciprocal act as a declaration of policy to avoid creating two rules--one that applies in reciprocal act proceedings and another that applies in other proceedings. See, Northley v. Worthley, 44 Cal.2d 465, 472-473, 283 P.2d 19 (1955).

The Miele case involved a former wife who sued in New Jersey for support pursuant to a New Jersey statute that provides: "...[A]fter decree of divorce, whether obtained in this State or elsewhere, the Court of Chancery may make such order touching the alimony of the wife ... as the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case shall render fit, reasonable and just The New Jersey court held that the support action should be dismissed because the Nevada judgment barred further relief in Nevada and the full faith and credit clause required New Jersey to give the Nevada decree the same force and effect that it had in Nevada.

- "... New Jersey will not be suffered to become a resort for wives whose matrimonial ties to their spouses have been severed in other jurisdictions and who, lacking further remedies there because of the finality and conclusiveness of the judgment entered in the litigation, seek out the New Jersey courts as a forum for additional relief not available in the foreign forums." 25 N.J. - 90. Armstrong v. Armstrong, 350 U.S. 568, 575 (1956)(concurring opinion).

 This concurring opinion was cited as a partial basis for the majority opinion in the Vanderbilt case, 354 U.S. 416, 419.
- 91. This proposition must be inferred from the discussion of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714 (1878), in Mr. Justice Black's majority opinion in the Vanderbilt case and his concurring opinion in the Armstrong case. See the discenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan in the Vanderbilt case: "The Court holds today, as I understand its opinion, that Nevada, lacking personal jurisdiction over Mrs. Vanderbilt, had no power to adjudicate the question

- of support, and that any divorce decree purporting so to do is to that extent wholly void--presumably in Nevada as well as in New York--under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, pursuant to the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714." 354 U.S. at 428.
- 92. Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416, 419 (1957). It has been Mr. Justice Black's consistent position throughout these cases that the full faith and credit clause requires the courts of each state to give a judgment rendered by a court of another state the same effect that the judgment has in the state where rendered. See his dissenting opinion in Williams v. North Carolina, 325 U.S. 226, 244 (1945). "... North Carolina cannot be permitted to disregard the Nevada decrees without passing upon the 'faith and credit' which Nevada itself would give to them under its own 'law or usage.'" 325 U.S. at . Hence, it is implicit in the opinions written by Mr. Justice Black that ex Parte divorce decrees cannot be given any effect even in the state where rendered insofar as they affect or purport to affect the support rights of the absent parties.
